PREFACE.

IN carrying through the press the various Essays, Analyses, and Translations, which have been selected to form this second division of Professor H. H. Wilson's Works, the editor has rigidly adhered to the principles by which he was guided in the former division: leaving the text almost invariably intact, and adding only such notes and references as would appear to him calculated to supply to the reader the means partly of corroborating, partly of supplementing, and perhaps occasionally also correcting, the statements made in the text. By far the greater number of the articles comprised in these three volumes were written between thirty and forty years ago, several even at a much earlier date, when the study of Sanskrit literature had hardly found more than a few followers yet in Europe. To any one, then, who would compare the present state of research in the field of Indian philology and antiquities with its condition at that early period, in which most of these Essays and Translations originated, it may appear a matter of less surprise that there should be found in them some views and statements at variance with the results of modern science, than that there should be so few of them. In the translations also, made exclusively from MSS. less with a view to literal and philological accuracy than to present to the reader a life-like picture of oriental manners and customs, the author's natural sagacity and his intimate acquaintance with Hindu life and modes of thought have happily unravelled many a knot, from solving which the state of the MSS. would probably have deterred less able scholars. Had Professor Wilson lived to superintend an edition of his works, he would perhaps have made a different selection, inserting some articles now omitted, and excluding others; he would perhaps have amalgamated into one essay several treating of kindred subjects, and certainly he would have reproduced most of them in a new form, with all the additional erudition and experience which a long and uninterrupted course of study and research would have enabled him to bring to bear upon it. But it could, of course, be no business of another editor's to attempt anything of the kind, even if he were either competent or presumptuous enough to do so. All that the present editor could venture to do was, to introduce a few verbal alterations and refer the reader, in the notes, to passages in those modern works from which additional information on the subjects in question may be gleaned. And while he justly claims for the venerable author the thanks of all Sanskrit scholars and students of eastern literature for having opened up new mines and struck out new paths, in which it was comparatively easy to those who came after him to make their way, he cannot refrain from deprecating the un-generous criticism of some who, while they tacitly own him their master, as indeed must every Sanskrit scholar of the present day, consider it anything but a piece of self-erogation to lose no opportunity of calling him to task.

The Analysis of the Purāṇas (Art. I.) was intended to have embraced all the eighteen Purāṇas, for which purpose Professor Wilson had made the most ample preparations. (See the introductory remarks, Vol. I, p. 5-7, and Journal Asiatique for 1860, Vol. XVI, p. 19.) But after his analysis of the Bráhma and Pádma Purāṇas was published, the original plan seems to have been either abandoned or postponed; at any rate, nothing more has appeared, so that, with the analysis of four others previously published in India, the Agni, Brahma Vaivartta, Vishnú, and Váyú, only the third part has actually been analyzed, which is here reprinted. Abstracts of the others, left in MSS., may perhaps ere long follow. In the mean time Professor Aufrecht's "Catalogus Codicum MSS. Sanscriticorum", and Professor Wilson's introduction and notes to his translation of the Vishnú Purāṇa, especially with the important additions by Prof. F. E. Hall, will be found rich storehouses of information on the contents of the Purāṇas.

The Introduction to the Mahábhárata (Art. IV.) was intended to serve merely as a general outline of the leading story of that epic. Since it was printed, Prof. M. Williams' useful and laborious book, entitled "Indian epic poetry", has appeared, to which the reader must be referred for a more detailed account. (See also Prof. M. Williams' remarks, Pref. p. IV f. Note.)

The greater portion of Vols. III and IV is taken up with analyses and translations of works of fiction, the most important of which is the Panchatantra. H. T. Colebrooke was, we believe, the first who, in the introductory remarks to Carey's edition of the Hitopadeśa (Serampore: 1804), drew attention to this ancient collection of fables, which he had "little hesitation in pronouncing to be the original text of the work, which was procured from India by Núshírván more than 1200 years ago," that work being the Pehlevi prototype of the Kalīla wa Damna, or Fables of Pilpay. In the "Mémoire historique" with which the late S. de Sacy accompanied his edition of the Arabic text of the Kalīla wa Damna (Paris: 1816), the question of the sources of that book and its history is discussed in more full and accurate detail than by any of his more immediate predecessors, Weber, Dunlop, and Roebuck: and it was chiefly by the perusal of this "Mémoire" that Professor Wilson's interest was stimulated to investigate the subject by making diligent use of all the means within his reach. After giving an abstract of S. de Sacy's researches, which was printed in Vol. I of the Oriental Magazine (Calcutta: 1823), p. 493-506, he presented to the Royal Asiatic Society in the following year an analytical Account of the Panchatantra (Art. VI.), made from three MS. copies of the Sanskrit original, and interspersed with translations, which was the more valuable not only as giving the first authentic and detailed information concerning that work itself, but also as embodying many collateral notices of similar stories in the mediæval literature of western Europe whose origin he traced back to that Indian source. In the history of Comparative Literature, in which Fiction forms one of the most attractive chapters, this treatise will ever deserve to hold a very important place, inasmuch as all subsequent works on the same or kindred subjects have taken their stand upon it. Among these may be mentioned L. Deslongchamps' "Essai sur les Fables Indiennes et sur leur introduction en Europe", an estimate of which is contained in Art. VII; Prof. A. Weber's essay on the connection of Indian with Greek fables ("Indische Studien", Vol. III, p. 327-73); and above all Prof. Th. Benfey's Introduction to the Panchatantra, which forms the first volume of his translation of that work into German, and exhaustively treats of the history and migrations of the fables and stories appertaining to that cycle. Many important contributions to the history of Fiction in Europe and Asia have also been made by the brothers Grimm, F. H. von der Hagen, A. Keller, R. Köhler, A. Kuhn, E. Lancereau, F. Liebrecht, Edéléstand du Méril, A. Schiefner, F. W. V. Schmidt, Th. Wright, and others; but it will suffice here for us to have mentioned their names. The Sanskrit text of the Panchatantra was edited by Kosegarten in the year 1848, and an edition of the more ornate and amplified recension was commenced by the same eleven years later, but interrupted by his death. It is greatly to be hoped that it may not remain a fragment.

The next great work of Hindu fiction which Professor Wilson made accessible to European readers is the Kathásaritságara, the largest collection of domestic narrative in India. Out of the eighteen books of which it consists he gave first, partly in a free translation, partly in detailed summary, Books I-V (Art. II.), and subsequently also an abstract of the remaining books (Art. VII.). It was by the former publication that the plan was suggested to Prof. H. Brockhaus of bringing out the Sanskrit text, with a faithful and elegant translation into German. For the latter was substituted from the 6th book onwards a close analysis, which will be continued as the remainder of the text comes out.

The Daśakumāracharita is the third work of Hindu fiction, with which Professor Wilson was the first to make us acquainted, in an English translation as well as subsequently in an annotated edition of the Sanskrit original, preceded by an introduction and summary (Art. V. and VIII.). The former—which he termed Extracts from the Daśakumāracharita, but which comprises the whole of the printed text—has hitherto been all but unknown in Europe, and will be read with pleasure, the summary serving as a thread by which to find one's way through the intricacies of the different stories. Since the publication of the text—another edition appeared at Calcutta in the year 1850—Prof. Benfey translated the second chapter, corresponding to pp. 189-210 in Vol. IV, with valuable introductory remarks (“das Ausland”, 1859, p. 121 ff.); Prof. A. Weber gave a full analysis of the work, with a literary introduction, in the “Monatsberichte der Königl. Academie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin” for 1859; and lastly, in the year 1862, Mons. H. Fauche published a French translation of the whole. The same author's Kávyádarśa has recently been edited at Calcutta by Paṇḍita Premachandra Tarkabāgīśa.

The treatise on the Medical and Surgical Sciences of the Hindus (Art. III.) cannot be considered as superseded by later works, such as Royle's and Wise's, on the same subject, though these, especially the latter, enter more into detail; for the opinion and authority of a writer on such difficult and abstruse matters, who had the rare fortune of being able to combine with his knowledge of medicin an unrivalled acquaintance with Sanskrit, is always entitled to the greatest deference.

The lecture on the art of war as known to the Hindus (Art. IX.) appears here for the first time in print, having probably been reserved by the author for future publication, that he might extend it and add to it the original text of the passages he translates and comments upon.

On the translation of the Meghadūta (Art. X.), which appeared at Calcutta as early as 1813, the author's reputation as a Sanskrit scholar was founded. A second edition came out in London after an interval of thirty years, with various alterations in the translation, and many omissions as well as a few additions in the notes. Excellent critical remarks upon the text will be found in Prof. C. Schütz's annotated German translation of the poem.

The review of Sir F. Macnaghten's Considerations on Hindu Law (Art. XI.) is the only treatise in which

Prof. Wilson has touched the province of jurisprudence, but it is no trespass or encroachment. His exposition of difficult points of Hindu law, based on an intimate acquaintance both with the original sources, the Smritis and Commentaries, and the habits and traditions of the people, are of great value even now that the works of Sir W. H. Macnaghten, Sir T. Strange, Mr. Morley and others have become standard authorities on Hindu law.

The review of the first edition, by A. W. von Schlegel, of the Bhagavadgītā (Art. XII.) appears to have remained unknown to all subsequent editors and translators of, and writers on, that philosophical poem. In reprinting it we have omitted those few passages that have become needless by the emendations introduced into the second edition (by Lassen. Bonn: 1846).

Though the first edition of the Sanskrit Dictionary was published at Calcutta forty five years ago, no work has yet appeared to supersede the preface with which it was accompanied (Art. XIII.). Many contributions towards a history of Sanskrit lexicography have, indeed, since incidentally been made by Lassen, Roth, Goldstücker, Weber, Hall, Westergaard, Böhtlingk and others; but they are scattered over various works and periodicals, so that a treatise on this branch of Indian literature, which should reflect the present state of Sanskrit scholarship, still remains a desideratum. The author himself, who was more competent than any other to accomplish such a task, seems to have deferred it from time to time; for not only did he let the second edition (Calcutta: 1832) appear without the Preface, but even long subsequently, when he was asked to allow it to be reprinted for the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, he declined to give his permission. That, however, he had an intention of re-writing it, may be inferred from a remark that occurs towards the end of the next Article (XIV.), a Notice of European grammars and lexicons of the Sanskrit language. At any rate, no considerations of the kind could prompt us to exclude it from these volumes, in which it will be welcomed by all students of Sanskrit literature who have not the rare first edition of the Dictionary within easy reach.

The last Essay in this division, the review of Prof. M. Müller's History of ancient Sanskrit Literature, was the last production of his fruitful pen: it appeared in the Edinburgh Review some months after his death.

Every apology is needed for the long interval of time which has been allowed to elapse since the publication of the first division of Professor Wilson's Works: but for a long illness, which incapacitated the editor for literary occupation for six months, these volumes would in due course have succeeded the two previously published.

ANALYSIS OF THE PURĀÑAS.

From the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, Vol. V (1838), p. 61.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

THE earliest inquiries into the religion, chronology, and history of the Hindus, ascertained that there existed a body of writings especially devoted to those subjects, from which it was sanguinely anticipated much valuable and authentic information would be derived. These were the Purāñas of Sanskrit literature, collections which, according to the definition of a Purāña agreeably to Sanskrit writers, should treat* of the creation and renovation of the universe, the division of time, the institutes of law and religion, the genealogies of the patriarchal families, and the dynasties of kings; and they, therefore, offered a prospect of our penetrating the obscurity in which the origin and progress of the Hindu social system had so long been enveloped. A formidable difficulty, however, presented itself in the outset, arising from the voluminous extent of this branch of the literature of the

* [Vide supra Vol. II, p. 67. Lassen, Ind. Alt. IV, 598.]

Hindus, and the absence of all facilities for acquiring a knowledge of its nature. The Puranas are eighteen in number, besides several works of a similar class, called Upa, or minor, Purāṇas. The former alone comprehend, it is asserted, and the assertion is not very far from the truth, four hundred thousand ślokas, or sixteen hundred thousand lines, a quantity which any individual European scholar could scarcely expect to peruse with care and attention, unless his whole time were devoted exclusively for very many years to the task. Nor was any plan, short of the perusal of the whole, likely to furnish satisfactory means of judging of their general character: few of them are furnished with anything in the shape of an index, or summary of contents, and none of them conform to any given arrangement; so that to know with accuracy what any one contains, it is necessary to read the entire work. The immensity of the labour seems to have deterred Sanskrit students from effecting even what was feasible, the publication or translation of one or two of the principal Puranas, and to the present day not one of them is accessible to the European public*.

The plan adopted by Sir William Jones and other Sanskrit scholars, in order to come at the contents of the Puranas with the least possible waste of their own time and labour, was the employment of Pandits to extract such passages as, from their report, appeared most likely to illustrate Hindu mythology, chronology, and history: and they themselves then translated the extracts, or drew up a summary of the subjects to which they related. The objections to this process are sufficiently obvious. The Pandits themselves are but imperfectly acquainted with the Purāñas; they rarely read more than one or two, as the Bhāgavata and Vishṇu, and accordingly the extracts furnished by them are limited mostly to those authorities, especially to the former. As the selection of the extracts was necessarily left to their judgment in a great measure, there was no security that they made the best choice they might have done, even from the few works they consulted. Even if the passages were well chosen they were still unsatisfactory, for it was impossible to know whether they might not be illustrated or modified by what preceded or what followed; and however judiciously and accurately furnished, therefore, they were still but meagre substitutes for the entire composition.

But a still more serious inconvenience attended this mode of procedure. It was not always easy to determine whether the extracts were authentic. Not to describe what was sought for, left the Pandit at a loss what to supply; to indicate a desire to find any particular information was to tempt him to supply it, even if he fabricated it for the purpose. Of this the well-known case of Colonel Wilford is a remarkable instance. The inquirer, under these circumstances, was placed in a very uncomfortable dilemma, as he went to work upon materials which might either say too little or too much—might leave him without the only information that was essential, or might embarrass him with an abundance by which he was afraid to benefit.

Detached portions of the Puranas were also of little or no value in another important respect. They threw little light upon the literary history of those works, upon their respective date, and consequent weight as authorities. It is true that none of the Puranas bear any dates, but most of them offer occasionally internal evidence of their relative order to one another, or to other compositions, or to circumstances and events from which some conjecture of their antiquity may be formed. Now if there be much difference in these respects amongst the Purāṇas, if some be much more modern than others, if some be of very recent composition, they cannot be of equal weight with regard to the subjects they describe, or with relation to the past social and religious condition of the people of India. How far, however, they are the writings of various and distant periods,—how far they indicate this dissimilarity of date, cannot be guessed at from a few detached passages, constituting a very insignificant portion of a very small part of their number.

Unsatisfactory as to their information, questionable as to their authenticity, and undetermined as to their authority, Extracts from the Puranas are yet the only sources on which any reliance can be placed for accurate accounts of the notions of the Hindus. The statements which they contain may be of different ages, and relate to different conditions, but as far as they go they are correct pictures of the times to which they belong. Recourse to oral authority, to the conversational information of ignorant and ill-instructed individuals, which constitutes the basis of most of the descriptions of the Hindus, published in Europe, is a very unsafe guide, and has led writers of undoubted talent and learning into the most absurd mistakes and misrepresentations. From these they would be preserved by adhering to the Pauranik writers; but a full and correct view of the mythology of the Hindus, of their religion as it still exists, and of much of their real history, is only to be expected when the Puranas shall have been carefully examined and compared, and their character and chronology shall have been as far as possible ascertained.

In order to effect the latter objects, as far as they might be practicable without the actual translation of the entire works, I adopted, several years ago, a plan for the particular examination of the contents of all the Puranas, which was carried into execution during the latter years of my residence in India. Engaging the services of several able Pandits, I employed them to prepare a minute index of each of the Puranas. This was not a mere catalogue of chapters, or sections, or heads of subjects, but a recapitulation of the subjects of every page and almost every stanza in each page; being, in fact, a copious abstract in the safer form of an index. It is necessary to call attention to this part of my task, the more particularly that it has been misconceived, and has been supposed to mean nothing more than such a summary as sometimes accompanies a Purana in the form of a list of the divisions of the work, and a brief notice of the topic of each. The indices prepared for me were of a very different description, as the inspection of them will at once exhibit¹. These indices were drawn up in Sanskrit. To convert them into English I employed several native young men, educated in the Hindu college, and well conversant with our language, and to them the Pandits explained the Summary which they had compiled. The original and translation were examined by myself, and corrected wherever necessary. When any particular article appeared to promise interest or information, I had that translated in detail, or translated it myself; in the former case, revising the translation with the original. In this manner I collected a series of indices, abstracts, and translations of all the Puranas with one or two unimportant exceptions, and of the Mahābhārata and Ramayana, from which, if I am not much mistaken, a correct notion of the substance and character of these works may now be safely formed.

The shape in which these abstracts exist is, however, too voluminous and unsystematic to admit of their being published, or of being used with advantage, except by persons engaged in the especial study of their subjects. In order to fit them for the perusal of those who wish to learn, conveniently as well as correctly, what the Purāñas have to teach, it is necessary to reduce the summaries of their contents to a connected and accessible form, and to indicate the circumstances which illustrate their purport, authenticity, and date. I have attempted to do this in a few scattered instances; and abstracts of the Vishnú, Váyu, Agni, and Brahma Vaivartta Purāñas have been published in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. I propose, however, now to go regularly through the whole series, in the order in which the Purāñas are commonly arranged, and begin accordingly with the Bráhma Purāña, which stands at the head of all the lists. In this, as in any other abstract which I may offer to the Society, I wish it to be understood that I do not trust solely to the index, or the partial translation which I have described, however satisfied I may be of their general fidelity. They are of great use as auxiliaries and guides, but the original is constantly before me, and nothing is stated except upon reference to the authority of the text. I trust, therefore, that my abstracts may lay claim to as much confidence as anything, except actual translation, can be considered to deserve.

I. BRĀHMA PURĀÑA.

THE Brāhma Purāña*, or Purāña of Brahma, is the first of the eighteen Puranas, according to all the authorities, except the Pādma Purana, which, in the Pátála Khaṇḍa or section, arrogates precedence to itself, and gives the second place to the Brāhma. This rather confirms than invalidates the usual specification, and the Brāhma Purāña may be regarded as the earliest of the series, at least in the estimation of the Paurāṇik writers. According to Bálambhaṭṭa, in his Commentary on the Mitákshará, it is consequently known by the name of Ādi, or First Purāña. It is also sometimes designated as the Saura Purana, as in part it treats of the worship of Súrya, the sun. Authorities generally agree in stating the extent of the Brāhma Purāña to be ten thousand stanzas. The Agni Purāña makes it twenty-five thousand, but is single in the enumeration. The actual number, in two copies consulted on the present occasion, is about seven thousand five hundred. There is, indeed, a work called the Uttara Khaṇḍa, or last section of the Brāhma Purana, which contains about three thousand stanzas more, but it is commonly met with detached; and whether it be properly a part of the Purāña to which it professes to belong, admits of question.

The first verses of the Brāhma Purāña, forming an address to Vishnú, under the appellations of Hari and Purushottama, sufficiently declare its sectarial bias, and indicate it to be a Vaishnáva work. It is not, however, included, in the classification of the Pádma Puráña, amongst the Vaishnáva works, but is referred to the Śákta class, in which the worship of Śakti, the personified female principle, is more particularly inculcated, and in which the Rájasa property, or property of passion, is predominant¹.

After the invocation, it is said that the Řishis, seated at Naimisháraña, were visited by Lomaharshaña the Súta, a d the disciple of Vyása, to whom in particular the Puráñas were imparted. The sages ask him to repeat to them an account of the origin, existence, and destination of the universe. Accordingly, he narrates to them the Bráhma Purana, as it was repeated, he says, by Brahmá, in reply to a similar request which was once made by Daksha, and other patriarchs. In this statement we have a variation, of some importance, perhaps, to the authenticity of the text, for the Mátsya Puráña asserts, that the Bráhma Puráña was communicated by Brahmá to Maríchi, who, although a patriarch, is a different person from Daksha, and if accurately designated by the Mátsya, shows, at least, a different reading in the copy consulted by the compiler of that work, and in those which are here followed.

The first chapter of the Purana describes the creation, which it attributes to Náráyaṇa or Vishnu, as one with Brahmá or Íswara. He makes the universe from the indiscrete cause which is one with matter and spirit, and the developement of which then proceeds conformably to the Sánkhyā philosophy. The first product from Pradhána, the chief principle or base of all substance, is Mahat, the great or intellectual principle, whence proceeds Ahankára, consciousness, or individuality. From this are produced the rudiments of the elements, and from them are developed the gross or perceptible elements, of which water is the menstruum of the rest, and first sensible ingredient in the formation of the world. The appearance of Brahmá on the waters, and the actual manifestation of the system of the universe, are described in the same manner as in Manu, and partly in the same words. Indeed, in this, and in all the early as well as some of the latter chapters of this Purāṇa, the words employed seem to be common to several of the Purāṇas, as will be particularly pointed out when we come to the parallel passages of the Vishṇu Purāṇa; and they appear to have been taken from some older work or works, from which the present Purāṇas are, probably, in part at least derived.

The birth of the first Manu Swáyambhuva and his wife Satarupá, and their descendants to the origin of Daksha, from the Práchetāsas by Mārishá, are next described, and are followed by a brief notice of the birth of Daksha's daughters, and the multiplication of beings by the intercourse of the sexes. The next chapter gives detailed accounts of the posterity of Daksha's daughters, especially of those wedded to Kaśyapa, comprising gods, demigods, demons, men, animals, and plants; or, in a word, all creatures, real or fabulous. In the third chapter occurs the history of Pṛithu; and in the fourth, an account of the fourteen Manwantaras, or reigns of the Manus. We have then a particular account of the origin of Vaivaswata, the reigning Manu, and of his descendants, constituting the solar dynasty, or line of princes descended from the Sun, stopping in one copy with Vajranábha, but in the other proceeding to Vṛihadbala, with whom the series usually closes. The princes of the lunar dynasty are then detailed to the period of the great war; and in the account of Kṛishná, the legend of his being accused of purloining a wonderful jewel is narrated at length. In all these details, which occupy fifteen chapters, the Bráhma Purana presents the same legends as are found in other Purāṇas, except that they are in general more concisely told.

The same may be said of the next chapters, which contain brief descriptions of the divisions of the earth, and of the several Dwīpas of which it consists, of Pátála, or the regions under the earth, and of the different hells: of the spheres above the earth, and the size and distances of the planets and constellations, and the influence of the sun and moon in producing rain and fertility. These extend to the twentieth chapter.

Part of the twentieth chapter takes up the subject of Tīrthas, or places to which pilgrimage should be performed, of which a few only are particularised, and the list is interrupted by a short geographical description of Bharata Varsha, or India Proper, its mountains, rivers, inhabitants, and merits. The portion which may be considered as characteristic* of this Purana then commences, and relates particularly to the sanctity of Utkala, or Orissa, arising, in the first instance, from the worship of the Sun, in various forms, in that country, the description of which, including legendary accounts of the origin of the twelve Adityas, or children of Aditi, the wife of Kaśyapa, and the story of Vaivaswata's birth from the Sun by his wife Sanjna, extends to the twenty-eighth chapter.

The sanctity of Utkala continues, however, to constitute the subject of the book, forming the loosely connecting thread of a variety of legends, the scene of which is laid in the province. Thus we have a description of the forest in Utkala called Ekamra, which is considered most holy from its being the favourite haunt of Śiva; and this suggests the legend of Daksha's sacrifice, the birth of Umā as the daughter of Himālaya, and her marriage with Siva, the destruction and renovation of the Deity of Love, the disrespect shown by Daksha to Śiva, and the punishment inflicted by the ministers of that deity upon the patriarch and his abettors. The Ekamra wood it appears was the place to which Siva repaired after these transactions, and hence its holiness. It is so called, it is said, from a mango-tree (Amra) which flourished there in a former kalpa or great age. According to the description that follows the legends above mentioned in great detail, its circuit was filled with gardens, and tanks, and palaces, and temples, the latter dedicated to various Lingas; and it comprised many Tírthas, or holy spots, as Viraja, Kapila, and others. Connected with it also was the tract sacred to Vishnu, or Purushottama Kshetra, which is next described; and then follows an account of Indradyumna, king of Avantí, by whom the temple of Vishnu was first erected at this spot; and the image of Jagannátha, made for him by Viśwakarma, originally set up. The proceedings of Indradyumna, on this occasion, are very fully narrated, and the account extends to the forty-sixth chapter.

The text then passes rather abruptly to a conversation between Vishnú and the sage Márkaṇḍeya, at the season of the destruction of the world, in which Vishnú tells the Muni that he is identical with all things, and that Śiva is the same as himself. The especial object of the legend is, however, to account for the sanctity of a pool Purushottama Kshetra, called the lake of Márkaṇḍeya, from its being attached to a temple with a Linga, erected by the Muni with the permission of Vishnú, bathing in which tank is a work of merit. We have then notices of other pools, and of trees and temples, with legends concerning their origin, and directions for bathing, praying and worshipping at various shrines. Copious instructions are given for the adoration of Purushottama or Jagannātha, Balarāma and Subhadrá; and a legend of the image of the former is introduced, in which it is said, that it was originally made for Indra, but carried off from his capital, Amarāvati, by Rávaṇa; that on the conquest of Lanká by Rāma, he left it with Vibhíshaṇa, and that it was presented by him to Samudra (Ocean), by whom it was set up on the coast of Orissa.

The advantages of living and dying at Purushottama Kshetra are then expatiated upon, and it is said that many Rishis, or sages, resided there at the recommendation of Brahmá. Amongst them was the sage named Kandu, and the mention of his name leads to a story of Pramlochá, the nymph of heaven, who was sent by Indra to interrupt Kandu's austerities, but became enamoured of him, and sojourned with him for many ages upon earth. This story was translated by the late M. Langlès, and the translation forms the first article of the "Journal Asiatique" of the Asiatic Society of Paris.

The praises of Vásudeva, or Kṛishṇa, introduce an account of some of the Avatáras of Vishṇu, of Brahmá's origin from him, and the production and death of the demons Madhu and Kaitabha. All this, however, is but preliminary to a narrative of the birth and actions of Kṛishṇa, including the usual legends of Balarāma, Pradyumna, and Aniruddha, and ending with the death of Kṛishṇa and the destruction of Dwáraká. These subjects extend from the sixty-fifth to the eighty-sixth chapter, and are, not only in their purport, but in their very language, the same as those which are found in the fifth book of the Vishnú Purána.

A series of chapters then ensues on Śráddhas, or obsequial sacrifices, on ceremonial and moral observances, on the duties of the several castes, and on the merit of worshipping Vishnú, especially at the Ekádaśí, or eleventh day of the moon's increase, which topic is illustrated by several insipid legends. These subjects occupy sixteen chapters. We then have a particular detail of the divisions of time, and the duration and influence of the four Yugas, or ages, introductory to a description of the degeneracy of mankind in the last, or Kali age, and the periodical destruction of the world.

When speaking of destruction, Vyása, to whom the character of narrator has been transferred in the course of the work, Lomaharshaña only repeating what his master had formerly said, describes absolute and final destruction, or the eternal cessation of existent things, by the exemption of an individual himself from all existence; and this leads to a question from the sages as to the nature of Yoga, or the practice of that abstraction by which final liberation is secured. In one copy of this Purána the answer is suspended by the abrupt insertion and evident interpolation of several chapters, in which an account of the solar dynasty of princes, from Vaivaswata to Ráma, is repeated; and some notice is taken of the origin of Soma, or the moon. These chapters are, however, clearly out of place, and in another copy they are wanting, Vyása proceeding correctly to describe the means of obtaining emancipation. With this view he gives a sketch of the Sāṅkhya system of philosophy, first in his own words, and then in the words of the Muni Vasishṭha, as addressed formerly to King Janaka; their conversation also contains a description of the practices of the Yogī, as suppression of breath, and particular postures, intended to withdraw his senses more completely from external objects. After describing the condition of the Sāttwika, or perfect man, attained by these means, and his becoming identified with Vāsudeva or Kṛishṇa, the work concludes with a panegyric upon itself, and dwells on the vast benefits derived by all classes of men from perusing it, or hearing it read.

That this summary of the Brahma Purāṇa faithfully represents its contents as it is ordinarily met with, may be inferred from the concurrence of the two copies consulted, one belonging to myself, and one to Mr. Colebrooke. In the Catalogue of the Sanskrit Manuscripts in the Royal Library of Paris also, No. V. of the Devanagari MSS., although erroneously denominated Rāma Sahasra Nama, "the thousand names of Rāma", an extract from the Brāhma Purana, is a portion of that work, and comprehends the chapters which relate to the worship of the sun, and the sanctity of Purushottama Kshetra, concurring, therefore, as far as it goes, with the copies here analyzed. It is nevertheless obvious, that such a Bráhma Purána as has been here described, cannot have any pretension to be considered as an ancient work, as the earliest of the Puránas, or even as a Purána at all. The first few chapters may have belonged to a genuine and an ancient composition, and some of the later sections may be regarded as not incompatible with the character of a Purána, but the greater portion of the work belongs to the class of Máhátmyas, legendary and local descriptions of the greatness or holiness of particular temples, or individual divinities. The Bráhma Purána as we have it, is, for the most part, the Máhátmya or legend of the sanctity of Utkala or Orissa.

Although the holiness of Utkala is owing especially to its including in its limits Purushottama Kshetra, the country between the Vaitarañs and Rasakoila rivers, within which, on a low range of sand-hills at Purí, stands the celebrated temple of Jagannáth; yet the Bráhma Purána also gives due honour to two other forms of Hindu superstition, to the worship of the sun, and that of Mahádeo in the same province, and this may assist us to some conjecture of the date of the work in its present form. The great seat of the worship of Śiva called Ekámra Kánana in our text, is now known as Bhuvaneśwara, a ruined city consisting entirely of deserted and dismantled towers and temples, sacred to the worship of Mahádeo¹. The great temple was erected by Lalita Indra Keśarī, Rājā of Orissa, and was completed A. D. 657. At what period the worship declined, and the temples fell into decay, no where appears, but these events were no doubt connected with the ascendancy of the adoration of Vishnú or Jagannáth, which probably began to flourish in its greatest vigour subsequently to the twelfth century.

The worship of the Sun seems to have enjoyed a more modern prosperity, for the remarkable temple at Kanárka, known to navigators as the Black Pagoda, was built by Rājā Langora Narsinh Deo, A. D. 1241. It seems to have disputed for a season preeminence with the homage paid to Jagannáth, for the temple of the latter divinity was constructed only forty-three years prior to the Black Pagoda, or in A. D. 1198. Jagannáth however triumphed over his rivals, and the shrine of the Sun, and the temples of Mahádeo, are now alike in a state of ruin: this could not have been the case when the Bráhma Purāña celebrated their glories, and they would appear, at the time when the Purāña was compiled, to have divided the veneration of the Hindus with their more fortunate competitor. The internal evidence which the work offers, therefore, renders it exceedingly probable, that it was composed in the course of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, or after the worship of Jagannátha predominated, but before Śiva and the Sun had fallen into utter disrepute.

The work which is called the Uttara Khaṇḍa, or "Last portion" of the Bráhma Puráña, is, as has been observed, always met with in a detached form, and as an independent composition. The subjects of which it treats, are also of a character wholly dissimilar from those of the Bráhma Puráña, and it is very obvious that there is no connexion between the two. If there be any Púrva Khaṇḍa, or prior section of the Bráhma Puráña, of which the Uttara Khaṇḍa is a continuation, it must be something very different from the work of which the preceding summary has been given.

The Uttara Khaṇḍa of the Bráhma Puráña consists of thirty-seven chapters, containing about three thousand stanzas. It is repeated by Śaunaka to Śatánika, as it was formerly narrated by Agastya to Supratika, a sage. It so far merits the denomination of Bráhma Puráña, that it has Brahmá for its hero: commencing with his incestuous passion for Saraswatí, and the birth of a son, Sumrídika, in consequence. Sumrídika, being offended with his parent, creates, by arduous penance, the brood of Asuras or Titans, by whom the gods are defeated, and Brahmá is expelled from heaven. Brahmá, however, by propitiating Śiva, is restored to his dignity and power, and employs Viśwakarma to build for him the city Driśyapura, on the banks of the Balajá river, the glory and sanctity of which stream it is the main purport of the work to panegyryze.

The Uttara Khaṇḍa of the Brahma Purāṇa, then, is nothing more than a Māhātmya of the Balajā river; but where the Balajā river flows, or where the city of Dṛiśyapura is situated, are matters to be decided only by future inquiry. The work itself affords no geographical intimations, except that the scene of Brahmá's penance and sacrifice, in propitiation of Śiva, and of various forms of his goddess, Devī or Umá, is laid in the north. Dṛiśyapura means merely the "beautiful city"; and other appellations given to it are derived from legends peculiar to this work, and afford no help in its verification. The Balajā river is called also the Bráhma hrada, "the lake of Brahmá", from his having performed penance on its borders; and Bāṇanáśá, "the destroyer of arrows", having cured the gods when wounded by the shafts of the demons. As personified, the stream is on one occasion identified with Nandini or Śákambharī Devī, and the latter goddess is the tutelary divinity of Sambher, and other places in Rajputána'. The lake of Brahmá might be thought to refer to the celebrated lake of Pushkara, where is still the only shrine known in India to be dedicated to Brahmá; but the Balajā is always described as a river, a great river, a Mahánadí, not a lake: the name means "Strength-born", the stream being produced by the power of the gods; an appellation that offers no aid in discovering its direction, and no such name occurs in the ancient or modern geography of India. In Báñanásá, however, we have in all probability the original of Banás, or Bunass, a river rising in Márwár, and flowing into the Chambal; and the Uttara Khañda of the Bráhma Purána is therefore most probably the local legend of some temple in Central India, which is now in ruins, and the memory of which has passed away. There is nothing in the record that survives, of interest or importance, as it is made up chiefly of accounts of battles between the gods and demons, and praises of the holiness of the river, intermixed with puerile legends of local invention, and thinly interspersed with others belonging to the general body of Pauránik fiction.

The Uttara Khañda of the Bráhma Purána is not to be confounded with the Brahmottara Khañda, a section of the Skánda Purána.

II. PÁDMA PURÁÑA.

THE Pádma Purána, which in the Pauránik lists occupies the second place, and in its own enumeration the first, is a work of considerable extent; according to the best authorities, and to its own statements, it consists of fifty-five thousand ślokas, and the copies that are current actually contain little less than that number, or about 50,000.

The Pádma Purāṇa occurs in various portions—according to its own text in five—the first of which treats of the appearance of Virát or Brahmá, and primary creation; it is termed the Paushkara, or Sṛishti Khaṇḍa. The second describes the formation and divisions of the earth, and various places of pilgrimage, whence it is called the Bhúmi, or Tírtha Khaṇḍa. The third contains an account of the regions above the earth, and of some celebrated princes, and is called the Swarga Khaṇḍa. The genealogies of princes are comprised in the fourth part; and the fifth, containing the Brahma Gítá, explains the means by which moksha, or final emancipation, may be attained. This is the specification of the divisions of the Purāṇa which is given in the first chapter of the Sṛishti Khaṇḍa, but it is not very exactly applicable to the work as it occurs. The three first portions are rightly denominated the Sṛishti, Bhúmi, and Swarga Khaṇḍas; but the fourth is called the Pátála Khaṇḍa, from its opening with a description of Pátála, the regions under the earth; and the fifth, or Uttara Khaṇḍa, is by no means restricted to philosophical discussion. There is current, however, a sixth division, the Kriyá Yoga Sára, which treats of the practice of devotion, and more nearly corresponds to the definition of the fifth portion given in the text.

The Paushkara, or Sṛishti Khaṇḍa consists of forty-six chapters and about 8500 stanzas. Lomaharshaṇa, the disciple of Vyása, sends his son Ugraśravas the Sūta to Naimisháraṇya, to relate the Purāṇas to Śaunaka and other Ṛishis assembled at that place. At Śaunaka's request he communicates to them that Purána, which, from its containing an account of the lotus (Padma), whence Brahmá appeared in order to create the world, is termed the Pádma Purána. Síta, in replying, proclaims also his right by birth and profession to narrate the Puráñas, which were in the present Kalpa imparted by Vishnú in the Matsya avatára to Brahmá, and by him to the gods in the first instance, and in the second to Lomaharshaña, by Vyása, who was a form of Brahmá. We have here also the assertion that the Puráñas consisted originally of 100 kotís, a thousand million of stanzas, of which 400,000 were thought sufficient for the instruction of man—the rest being preserved by the gods. Síta then recapitulates all that he purposes to narrate to the Ṛishis, the whole of which he says was formerly imparted by Brahmá to his will-begotten son, the patriarch Pulastya, by whom it was related at Gangá-dwára to Prince Bhíshma; in fact, therefore, Pulastya is the person to whom this portion of the Pádma Purána is properly to be ascribed.

Pulastya, at the request of Bhíshma, instructs him how the universe was framed. The process is as usual in the Puráñas that of the Sánkhyá philosophy, or from the eternal Pradhána proceed successively Mahat, Ahankára, the senses, the rudimental elements, and the gross elements, to which is superadded the egg of creation, as in Manu. Creation, however, is the will and act of the uncreated supreme Brahma, who takes the form of Purusha, and in that character infuses into Prakṛiti the germ of activity. Brahma is, in his various functions, Brahmá, Vishnú, and Śiva; but there is a peculiarity in this chapter which deserves notice: the different Purāṇas commonly identify either Vishnú or Śiva with the Supreme, but in this part of the Pádma, Brahmá and Brahma, the instrument and first cause of creation, are represented as the same; the primeval, excellent, beneficent, and supreme Brahma, in the form of Brahmá and the rest, is the creation and the creator, preserves and is preserved, devours and is devoured, the first immaterial cause being, as is common in the pantheism of the Purāṇas, also the material cause and substance of the universe; notwithstanding, however, the character here given to Brahmá, the Pádma Purāṇa is, according to its own classification, a Vaishṇava Purāṇa, and deserves that character by its frequent intimation of the supremacy of Vishnú.

The third chapter contains an account of the divisions of time, from an instant to the life of Brahmá, conformably to the usual Paurāṇik chronology, and in words common to different Purāṇas. This is introductory to the renewal of creation, after a night of Brahmá, when that deity, in the character of Vishnú, assumed the form of a boar, and having placed the earth upon the waters, created its several divisions, and peopled them with animate and inanimate beings. We have then another detail of the creation, rather of a mystical description, in which the different orders of beings proceed from modified conditions of the body of Brahíná. These not multiplying, Brahíná produces the Prajápatís from his will, then the Rudras, then Swáyambhuva Manu, whose daughters, Ákúti and Prasúti, married to Daksha and Ruchi, give birth to daughters, who are espoused to the Řishis, forming the earlier patriarchal families, which are evidently nothing more than an allegorical representation of the institution of moral obligations and ceremonial rites by certain holy personages, the first teachers of the Hindu religion. All these details occur in the same order, and in essentially the same words, in the early chapters of the Vishnú Purána*.

The same identity continues with regard to the origin of Lakshmi from the churning of the ocean, but the parallel is then suspended by the introduction of the story of Daksha's sacrifice, which is narrated at some length. We have then an account of the family of the second Daksha, as in the Vishnú and other Puráñas—short notices of the several Manwantaras—the story of Veña and Prithu—the origin of Vaiswata and the descendants of the sun in the line of Ikshwáku to Śrutáyus, who it is said was killed in the great war. The genealogy of this chapter is little else than a string of names, and agrees with that given in the Kúrma and Matsya Puráñas better than with that of the Vishnú.

Bhíshma then requests to be informed of the origin and nature of the Pitṛis, or progenitors of mankind; in reply to which, Pulastya describes the Śráddha, or offerings to deceased ancestors, and the merits of its celebration, particularly at Gayá. These subjects, illustrated by the story of Brahmadata, as it occurs also in the Hari Vansa*, occupy three chapters, from the ninth to the eleventh inclusive. The two next chapters contain an account of the dynasty of lunar princes to the time of Kṛishṇa and his immediate posterity, rather more in detail than the solar genealogy, but the same in substance as in other Purāṇas.

We have next a series of legends relating to the wars between the gods and Titans or Asuras, which, although not restricted to the Pádma Purāṇa, are in some degree peculiar in their order and details. The Asuras are described as enjoying the ascendancy over the Devatás, when Vṛihaspati, taking advantage of their leader Śukra's being enamoured of a nymph of heaven, sent by Indra to interrupt his penance, comes amongst the former as Śukra, and misleads them into irreligion by preaching heretical doctrines; the doctrines and practices he teaches are Jain, and in a preceding passage it is said that the sons of Ráji embraced the Jina Dharma—notices which are of some value with regard to the age of the compilation.

An inquiry into the cause of the enmity that prevailed between the two heroes, Karna and Arjuna, suggests a curious legend of a quarrel between Brahma and Śiva, in which a being born from the perspiration of the former puts the latter to flight. Śiva repairs to Vishnú, who offers to put alms into Śiva's dish, when Śiva pierces the hand of Vishnú, and the blood that flows in consequence fills the Kapála, and becomes a Nara, a man—the saint Nara in another birth, and Arjuna in another. Brahmá's progeny becomes in a succeeding existence Karṇa, and hence the hostility of the two, the legend considering them evidently as types of the followers of Brahmá and of Śiva in a contest for superiority. The same notion of a struggle between the two sects prevails in what follows. The lustre of Brahmá's fifth head excites the envy of the gods, and Śiva, at their suggestion, tears it off. To expiate the crime of injuring a Brahman, Śiva, by the advice of Vishnú, repairs to various Tírthas, and this leads to the Pushkara Máhátmya, or the description of the holiness of Pushkara or Pokhar Lake near Ajmír, a subject that more or less pervades the rest of the Śríshtí Khaṇḍa from the fifteenth chapter to the end.

The praises of Pushkara, instructions for bathing and worshipping there, and the efficacy or gifts and sacrifices performed at this sacred spot, are abundantly interspersed with legends, some peculiar to the work and to the subject, and others belonging to the general body of tradition and mythology, but rather arbitrarily connected in the Pádma Purána with the sanctity of Pushkara. Of the former class we have Brahmá's throwing down a lotus (Pushkara) from heaven, whence the name of the place where it fell; his performing a solemn sacrifice there; his marriage with Gáyatrī; the displeasure of his former bride Sávitṛī, in consequence of which she denounced imprecations on all the gods and Brahmans; the metamorphosis of King Prabhanjana to a tiger, and his liberation; the fidelity of the cow Nandá, and her elevation to heaven; and similar stories, some of which are curious, but most puerile. Of fictions which are to be found in several other Purāñas, we have the death of Vṛitrásura by Indra's vajra, or thunderbolt, formed of the bones of the sage Dadhíchi, and Agastya's humbling the Vindhya mountain, drinking up the ocean, and destroying the Āsuras who had sought refuge beneath its waters. The bed of the ocean was afterwards replenished by King Bhagíṛatha when he brought the Ganges from heaven.

The subjects that next occur are Vratas, or acts of self-denial and devotion, to be performed on particular occasions, as on the third lunation of each month in the year, when worship is to be addressed to some form or other of Gaūrī, either with or without her consort Śiva; also on certain specified days, as the Vibhúta Dwádaśī, Viśoka Dwádaśī, Kalyāña Saptamī, Bhaimī Ekádaśī, and others, illustrated as usual by legends, amongst which the birth of Vaśishṭha and Agastya occurs, and the story of the latter's drinking the ocean is repeated as introductory to the efficacy of worshipping Agastya at Pushkara Tírtha. Márkaṇḍeya Muni's going in pilgrimage to Pushkara gives occasion to some account of him, and of his intercourse with Rámachandra, who passed a month at Pushkara, and performed Śráddha there when on his way to the scene of his exile, circumstances of which the Rámáyāna takes no notice. Kshemankarí Deví, a form of Durgá residing at Pushkara, is wooed by Mahishásura, whose origin is related; he attempts to carry her off by force, but is slain, and an account is then given of some other exploits of the goddess. We have then a eulogium of the merits of giving food and drink, illustrated by the punishment of Śweta, king of Ilávrita-varsha, condemned to gnaw his own bones after death, as a penance for his omitting to distribute food in charity whilst he lived; and by anecdotes of Rámachandra, including the history of Dańda, after whom the Dańdakárańya, or great southern forest, was named; Ráma acts as an umpire between a vulture and owl in a dispute for a nest, and the nest being assigned to the owl, the vulture, who was King Brahmadata, condemned to this transformation, resumes his form and goes to heaven. After returning to Ayodhyá, and celebrating the Rájasúya sacrifice, Ráma again travels to the South, and pays a visit to Vibhíshańa: on his quitting Lanká he broke down the bridge that connected the island with the main land, and on his way home visited Pushkara and shook hands with Brahmá.

After these legends we have an account of the creation in the Pádma Kalpa, prefaced by a second detail of the divisions of time, closing in a periodical dissolution; during which Náráyaṇa, sleeping upon the waters, is beheld by Márkaṇḍeya Muni, who, by desire of the deity, enters the celestial body, and beholds in it all existent things. This legend occurs in several Purāṇas, particularly in that which bears the name of the Muni*. Brahmá, then becoming manifest from a golden lotus, creates the world and its divisions out of the several parts of the lotus, whence this period of creation is called the Pádma Kalpa. After the formation of the world, and the destruction of the demons Madhu and Kaitabha who sought to destroy Brahmá, by Vishnú, the work proceeds as before, through the intervention of the mind-engendered Prajápatis, the daughters of Daksha, and progeny of Kaśyapa. The concluding chapters describe the wars of the gods and demons, the destruction of Máya and Kálanemi by Vishnú, and the birth of Skanda for the destruction of Táraka, the overthrow and death of the demon, and Skanda's marriage with Devasená. "Then," concludes Síta, "Pulastya departed, and Bhíshma having become filled with true knowledge, returned to his government of Hástinapura." A final chapter contains a tolerably copious index of the contents of the Srishti Khaṇḍa.

Bhūmi Khaṇḍa. The second division of the Pádma Purāṇa is of much the same extent as the first, containing about 7500 stanzas, which are distributed amongst 133 short chapters. It opens with a question put by the Īśhis to Súta, how it happened that Prahráda, or Prahláda, a daitya, and natural enemy of the gods, could have been inspired with the devotion he entertained for Vishnú, and finally united with that deity. Súta replies by stating, that the same question had been formerly asked of Brahmá by Vyása, and he repeats Brahmá's answer as Vyása had communicated it to him, which is a narrative of Prahláda's birth and actions in a preceding kalpa. This allusion to Prahláda, it may be observed, without any preliminary details, implies a knowledge of his history, which can only be derived from some earlier work; what this may have been, it is not very possible to ascertain, as the legend occurs in several Puráñas, and mention is made of Prahláda in the Mahábhárata. For his character, however, of a devout worshipper of Vishnú, the Vishnú Purána and Bhágavata are the especial authorities*.

In order to account for Prahláda's eminence as a Vaishnáva, Súta repeats a story of Śivaśarman, a Brahman of Dwáraká, who had five sons, equally remarkable for their piety and filial devotion. The latter is put to the test in various ways by their father, and being proof against every trial, the father and the four elder sons are united after death with Vishnú; Somaśarman, the fifth son, was also desirous of the same elevation, and was engaged at Śalagrāma Kshetra

* [Vishnú Pur. I, 17–20. Bhágav. Pur. VII, 4–6. See Burnouf's Pref. ad Vol. III, p. viii ff. Lassen, Ind. Alt. IV, 582 f.]

in that contemplation on Vishnú which it is the great object of this part of the Pádma Purāña to inculcate as the most efficacious means of union with the divinity, as it is here said, "The imperishable state is not obtained by sacrifice, by penance, by abstract meditation, by holy knowledge, but by thinking upon Vishnú: the destroyer of Madhu is not beheld through gifts or through pilgrimage, but through the union that is effected by intense contemplation: the Brahman enters the state of Vishnú by the road of profound mental identification." Whilst Somaśarman is endeavouring to effect this coalescence, an alarm spreads through the hermitage that the Daityas are approaching, and a loud clamour ensues, which distracts his thoughts, and fills his mind with fear of the foes of the gods; he dies whilst under these apprehensions, and is consequently born again as a member of that race which engrossed his last thoughts. He is born as Prahláda, the son of Hirańyakaśipu, a daitya, but from the influence of his former life a worshipper of Vishnú. In the war between the gods and demons, however, he takes part with his family, and is killed by the discus of Vishnú. He is again born of the same parents and with the same name, and is then the Prahláda who is the hero of the usual story, the pious son of an impious father, the latter of whom was destroyed by Vishnú in the Nṛisinha, or man-lion avatára, and the former was raised to the rank of Indra for his life; and finally united with Vishnú. The Pádma Purāña, therefore, in borrowing the subject of this legend from other sources, has added to it circumstances peculiar to itself, evidently of sectarial tenor, and comparatively recent invention.

The elevation of Prahlāda to the rank of king of heaven—a dignity which no other Purāṇas assign him, although they make him monarch over a division of Pátāla—suggests to the Rīshis an inquiry into the nature of celestial dominion, and upon whom and by whom it is conferred; and this introduces a legend of the birth of a king of the gods, or Indra, as the son of Kaśyapa and Aditi, in consequence of a boon to that effect promised to Aditi by Vishṇu. Kaśyapa's other wives, Diti and Danu, the mothers of the Daityas and Dānavas, feeling mortified at the inferiority of their children to those of their sister-wife Aditi, Kaśyapa, in order to console them, enters upon a long philosophical disquisition upon the nature of body and soul. The discussion is conducted in the form of an allegory, in which the Senses endeavour to negotiate a perpetual alliance with Soul, and Soul, after several vain struggles to evade all connexion with the Senses, at last escapes from them altogether by the aid of meditation.

After describing the determination of the chief Daityas to raise themselves to a level with the gods by arduous penance, the Rīshis rather abruptly ask Sūta to tell them the story of a Brahman called Suvrata, the son of Somaśarman and Sumanās, who was a devoted worshipper of Vishṇu, and who became, therefore, in a future birth, Indra, the son of Kaśyapa and Aditi. The legend is an insipid sectarian fiction, but contains some curious matter, especially regarding virtue and vice, the reward of the former and punishment of the latter after death, the road to the judgment-seat of Yama, his appearance, and the tortures to which sinners are condemned. The text then reverts to the austerities of the demons, and particularly those of Hirañyakaśipu, which compel Brahmā to grant him a boon that he shall not be slain by any living creature; it therefore becomes necessary for Vishnu to destroy him in the non-descript form of the Nṛsiṃha; whilst in the Avatāra of the boar, he puts to death Hirañyāksha and other demons. These events are briefly referred to, and are but introductory to a longer legend of the birth of Vṛitra, the son of Diti, for the destruction of Indra, and of his being circumvented and slain by the deity. We have then the story of Indra's cutting to pieces another offspring of Diti, destined to be his foe whilst yet in the womb, and thus giving rise to the forty-nine Maruts or winds.

In like manner as Indra was made king of the gods, different persons or things were appointed by Brahmā supreme over their respective orders of beings; and amongst these, the list of which conforms with that which occurs in other Purāṇas, Prithu, the son of Vena, was made monarch of the earth. This leads to the story of Veṇa and Prithu, which is narrated in the usual manner and customary words; but a supplement is added to the legend of Veṇa, which is peculiar to this Purāṇa. According to this, Tunga, the son of Atri, having propitiated Náráyaṇa, by penance, obtained a son equal to Indra; this son was Veṇa, who was made by the Ṛishis the first king of the earth; he commenced his reign auspiciously, but lapsing into the Jain heresy, the sages deposed him and pummelled him until the Nisháda, or progenitor of the wild races, was extracted from his left thigh, and Pṛithu from his right arm. Being freed from sin by the birth of the Nisháda, Veṇa retires to the banks of the Narmadá, where he performs penance in honour of Vishṇu, who appears to him, and reads him a lecture on the merit of gifts of various kinds, especially at different holy places or Tírthas. But persons are also considered as Tírthas, as a Guru, a father, a wife; and in illustration of this latter, Vishṇu tells a story of Sukalá, the wife of a Vaiśya, who, having gone on a pilgrimage, leaves Sukalá in great affliction; her female friends come to console her, and their conversation includes many precepts for the conduct of women, exemplified by narratives. Sukalá continuing to mourn for her absent lord, Kámadeva and Indra attempt to seduce her from her faith, but are foiled, and she remains faithful to her husband, who returns from pilgrimage, and receives blessings from heaven in recompense of the virtues of his wife.

Another series of tales is recited by Vishṇu, in illustration of a parent's being a Tírtha, or holy shrine. It commences with an account of the filial piety of Sukarman, the son of Kuṇḍala, a Brahman of Kurukshetra, but branches off into several other stories: one of the most remarkable of these is a narrative, of which the original is to be found in the *Mahābhārata, that of Yayāti's transferring his infirmities to his son Pūru. It is embellished, however, in this place, with much additional matter, and begins with Yayāti's being invited by Indra to heaven, and being conveyed on the way thither by Mátali, Indra's charioteer. A philosophical conversation takes place between the king and Mátali, in which the imperfection of all corporeal existence, and the incomplete felicity of every condition of life are discussed. These attributes belong, it is said, even to the gods themselves, for they are affected with disease, subject to death, disgraced by the passions of lust and anger, and are consequently instances of imperfection and of misery. Various degrees of vice are then described, and their prevention or expiation are declared to be the worship of Śiva or Vishnú, between whom there is no difference; they are but one, as is the case indeed with Brahmá also; for "Brahmá, Vishnú, and Maheśwara, are one form, though three gods: there is no difference between the three: the difference is that of attributes alone." The result of the conversation is, that Yayāti returns to earth, where, by his virtuous administration, he renders all his subjects exempt from passion and decay. Yama complains that men no longer die, and Indra sends Kámadeva and his daughter

Ásruvindumatí to endeavour to excite passion in the breast of Yayāti; they succeed, and it is in order to become a fit husband for the latter that the aged king applies to his sons to give him their youth in exchange for his decrepitude. As elsewhere related, they all refuse, except Púru, the youngest. After a time, however, Yayāti is prevailed upon by the persuasion of his young bride, at the instigation of Indra, to go to heaven, on which he restores his youth to Púru, and proceeds with his subjects to Indra, who sends them to Śiva, and he directs them to Vishnú, in whose sphere they obtain a final abode.

We then come to a series of narratives in illustration of the assertion that a Guṛu, or spiritual preceptor, is a Tírtha. Chyavana, the son of Bhrigu, wandering over the world in pilgrimage, comes to the south bank of the Narmadá, where a Linga, called Omkára, is erected; and having worshipped it, he sits under an Indian fig-tree, where he overhears a conversation between Kunjara, an old parrot, and his four sons, in which the latter relate to the former what they have beheld in their flight during the day. Several stories are narrated, the moral of which is the same, the good effects of venerating holy men, and meditating upon Vishnú. In the course of them, the efficacy of various holy places in expiating sin is described, and in one of the stories it appears that the Ganges, the lake Mánasa, Prayága, Pushkara, and Benares, are of less sanctity than the river Revá or Narmadá in various parts of its course, as at the confluence of the Kujá, Kapilá, Meghanádá, and Chichuká, at Śaivágara, Bhṛīguksheṭra, Mahishmatí, Śrīkañṭha, and Mañḍaleśwara, places which are little known beyond their immediate vicinity, and of which the specification indicates the local origin of this part at least of the Purāṇa. One long narrative is peculiar to the work, and relates to the destruction of the demon Tuṇḍa by Nahusha, the son of Áyus, and the marriage of the latter with Ásokasundarí, the daughter of Párvatí. We have also an account of the destruction of Vituṇḍa, the son of Tuṇḍa, by Bhagavatí herself. Kunjara then relates to Chyavana an account of the preceding births of his sons and himself.

After this, Vishnú desires Veṇa to demand a boon, and he solicits to be incorporated with the deity; Vishnú tells him first to celebrate an Áśwamedha, after which the king shall become one with himself, and he then disappears. The conversation between Veṇa and Vishnú extends from the fortieth to the end of the one hundred and eighteenth chapter.

Prithu enables his father Veṇa to consummate the sacrifice, by which he is united to Vishnú, and this incident illustrates the efficacy of a son considered as a Tírtha. The Jangama, or moveable Tírthas, being thus disposed of, Síta proceeds, in the words of Vyása, to describe the Sthávara, the fixed or geographical Tírthas. The principal of those that are named are Pushkara, Mahákála, the Narmadá, the Charmanvatí or Chambal, Arbuda or Abú, Prabhása, the confluence of the Saraswatí with the ocean, Dwáravatí, and the mouths of the Indus, the Vitastá river, the source of the Deviká, Kámákhyá in Ásám, and Kurukshetra. There are many others, most of which are now unknown: one called Rámahrada, the lake of Ráma, introduces the familiar legend of Paraśuráma, and his destruction of the warrior race, which is told in the usual strain, but more concisely than in some other works. The subject of Tírthas continues to the end of the hundred and twenty-seventh chapter.

In the next chapter the compiler seems to have recollected the purport of the appellation of this part of the Pádma Purána, and the Rishis ask Síta to give them a description of the earth; in reply, he repeats an account attributed to the great serpent Śesha, and related by him to Vátsyáyana and other sages assembled at the coronation of Vásuki as king of the serpent race, in which the seven Dwípas, or insular zones, that form the earth, and the Lokáloka mountain which surrounds the whole, are described in the usual manner. In the account of Jambu-dwípa we have the usual details concerning the several Varshas, and mountains that separate them and Mount Meru and its surrounding elevations. The details, however, are not very particular or full, and are exclusively of a mythological character.

The last chapter of this khaṇḍa, as well as that of the Srishti khaṇḍa, contains a tolerably copious index.

Swarga Khaṇḍa. The third division of the Pádma Purána consists of about 4000 stanzas in forty chapters; it carries on the dialogue between Śesha and the Rishis with which the previous portion concluded, and which Sūta continues to repeat.

Vátsyáyana having asked Śesha to give him and the other Munis a description of the regions above the earth, the snake-god replies by referring to a conversation on this subject between a messenger of Vishnú and King Bharata. The mention of the latter suggests to Vátsyáyana to inquire into his history; and the first five chapters of the work are appropriated to the narrative of Śakuntalá and Dushyanta, in which the drama of Kálidása is evidently the authority that has been followed. Bharata, the son of Dushyanta, after reigning with glory, becomes a worshipper of Vishnú, in consequence of which Sunanda, a servant of the deity, is sent to convey the king, after his resigning his crown to his son, to Vaikuñtha. On the way Bharata asks him to give him an account of the regions which they traverse, and Sunanda accordingly describes to him the situation and extent of the different Lokas or spheres above the earth. The same contrivance occurs in other works, and especially in the Káśi Khaṇḍa of the Skanda Purāṇa, from which possibly the idea has been borrowed.

The atmosphere, planetary regions, heaven, and the four upper worlds, Mahar, Jana, Tapas, and Satya, are noticed briefly in the usual manner, and above these is placed Vaikuñtha, the heaven of Vishnú, according to this authority. Recurring to the subject, Sunanda then proceeds to describe in detail the subdivisions of these super-terrene realms, the Lokas or spheres, inhabited by various orders of beings, as the Bhútas, Piśáchas, Gandharbas, Vidyádharas, and Apsarasas, adverting also to the circumstances which people these ærial districts, or obtain for mortals a place in them after death. When describing the Apsaraloka, Sunanda relates the story of Purúravas and Urvaśí after the ordinary Paurāṇik fashion, with the addition that Purúravas, by worshipping the Gandharbas, obtained a residence with Urvaśí in the sphere of the nymphs, and that Bharata, by transferring to him the merit of all the sacrifices he had performed in honour of Vishnú, enabled him to proceed to Vaikuṇṭhá.

We have then accounts of the Lokas of the sun, Indra, Agni, Yama, the Dikpálas, Varuṇa, Váyu, interspersed with stories. At the Loka of Kuvera an account of the origin of Rávaṇa, and his expelling Kuvera from Lanká is related. The lunar sphere, or Loka of Soma, affords occasion for the usual legends of the birth of Soma and of Budha, of Daksha's cursing Soma to be afflicted with consumption, as the punishment of his neglecting all his wives except one, Rohiṇí, and his consequent alternations of increase and wane. In like manner the Loka of Saturn introduces the story of his birth from the wife of the sun, and that of Dhruva suggests the legend of Dhruva's adoration of Vishnú, and his elevation to the dignity of the Polar Star. After rising above this sphere, and passing by the upper Lokas, which are again briefly described, Bharata is carried by Sunanda to Vaikuṇṭhá.

Vátsyáyana then asks Śesha to tell him what princes of the solar and lunar races, who were celebrated when on earth for their religious acts, were raised to heaven. Śesha in reply repeats several narratives, which seem to be preserved in their most ancient and authentic form in the Rámáyāṇa and Mahábhárata, and to have been thence transferred to the Purāṇas with various degrees of detail and modification. In this work they are narrated at length, and embellished occasionally with additions, which are evidence of a corrupt taste and of a comparatively recent date. The narratives are Sagarā's exploits and sacrifice, the death of his sons by Kapila's wrath, the birth of Bhágratha and his bringing Gangá upon earth, the origin of the demon Dhundhu, here called the son of Madhu, and his destruction by Kuvalayáśwa, thence termed Dhundhumára; the generosity of King Śivi in offering his own flesh to rescue a pigeon from the gripe of a hawk, the birds being in fact Indra and Agni, who had assumed their shape to put the benevolence of Śivi to the test; his further trial by Brahmá; the sacrifice of Marutta; Divodása's reign at Káśi; Śiva's regaining possession of that sacred city; and the birth and piety of Mándhātṛi.

At an Aswamedha performed by Mándhātṛi, the king is visited by Nárada, and a conversation takes place, in which the sage gives a brief description of the course of creation conformably to the Sánkhyā tenets. Speaking of the origin of the four castes, Nárada explains their respective obligations, and then proceeds to the duties of the different áśramas or periods of life. Under the last order, he expounds the nature of yoga, practical and speculative, or Karma yoga and Jnána yoga. He then details the Sadácháras, or daily observances, incumbent on all classes of men, ceremonial, purificatory, moral, and devotional. The latter are, of course, to be addressed especially to Vishnú, and to the types of him, the principal of which is the Śálagrána stone, or Ammonite, without which, it is said, worship should not be offered. This fossile is said to be the present Vishnú with his discus, and to drink of the water in which it has been immersed is described as a sure means of obtaining emancipation during life, and being united with Vishnú after death. Great efficacy is also ascribed to sectarial marks, which are to be made after bathing, and before all religious rites, on the top of the arms, the chest, the throat, and the forehead. The merit of fasting on the ekádaśí, or eleventh lunation, and the heinous crime of eating on a day sacred to Vishnú, are then pointed out, and the whole offers a sufficiently decisive indication of the character of the compilation as a purely sectarial work.

Several sections are then devoted to a description of the things that may or may not be eaten; to modes and times of dressing and anointing the person, to postures in which it is proper to sit or lie on different occasions, to the crime of slandering a venerable person, on which it is observed that Śiva is excluded from all share in oblations, on account of his disrespectful conduct towards his father-in-law, Daksha; to lucky and unlucky omens; to actions proper and improper, according to particular seasons; to the favourable characteristics of a wife, and to a variety of injunctions and prohibitions.

Mándhātṛi's asking Nárada if he had ever known any person who had lived a hundred years, a singular question by the way for a monarch to put, who, according to Paurāṇik tradition, lived at a period when a reign of many thousand years was no rarity, Nárada tells him a tale of Brahmaketu, son of Viśwaketu, king of Dráviḍa, who was doomed to die in his sixteenth year, but who, by advice of Angiras, went to Benares, and lay down in the path of Yama, when on a visit to Śiva. Yama, who never deviates from a straight path and even an equal step, and could, therefore, neither walk round Brahmaketu, nor stride over him, at last, to induce him to rise, promised to allow him to live a century, which accordingly happened. There is an underplot of Brahmaketu's marrying the daughter of the king of Kámpilya, in lieu of the hunchbacked son of the king of Kekaya, which has some resemblance to a story in the Arabian nights.

Mándhātṛi next asks Nárada to explain to him what he meant by Śiva's ill-behaviour to his father-in-law, on which Nárada relates the story of Daksha's sacrifice, much in the usual strain, but concisely, and making no mention of Vishnú amongst the guests. Daksha also is permitted to complete the rite, the head of a goat being substituted for his own, which he had lost in the affray.

In reply to other questions put by Mándhátří, Ná-rada describes the actions by which an individual is sentenced to heaven or hell; the Brahmans who are entitled to gifts and to respect, the necessity of regal government, the consequences of a good or evil administration, the duties of kings, the succession and duration of the four Yugas, and the temporary dissolution of the world. Ná-rada then takes leave of the king, and goes to the heaven of Indra. A somewhat abrupt introduction of the Muni Saubhari and his marriage with the daughters of Mándhátří then occurs, after which the king completes his sacrifice and goes to heaven, with which the series of narratives terminates. The last chapter is an index of the contents of the Bhúmi Khańda.

The Pátála Khańda of the Pádma Purána contains 102 chapters and about 9000 stanzas. It commences with a continuation of the dialogue between Vátsyáyana and Śesha, in which the snake-god describes the different regions of Pátála.

The first, Atala, is subject to Mahámáya. Vitala, the second, to a form of Śiva, called Hátakeśwara, the third, Sutala, to Bali, who, on one occasion, made Rávańa prisoner, which legend is related. Máya reigns over Talátala, the fourth division, he having been raised to that dignity after the destruction of his three cities by Śiva, an account of which exploit is detailed. In Mahátala, the fifth region, reside the great serpents; and in Rasátala, the sixth, the Dai-tyas and Dánavas. The chief Nágas, or snake-gods, under their monarch Vāsuki, occupy the lowermost of the subterranean kingdoms, that which is especially called Pátāla.

In the account of Rāvaṇa's captivity by Bali, mention was made of his future death by Viṣṇu, in the form of Rāma, a prince of the solar dynasty, and Vātsyāyana referring to this asks Śeṣha to give him an account of some of the most celebrated monarchs of this family, and of the descent of Viṣṇu as Rāma. Śeṣha accordingly commences with the origin of the Manu Vaivaswata from Aditya, the son of Kaśyapa, the son of Marīchi, the son of Brahmā, previous to whose Manwantara, the Manu was preserved by Viṣṇu, in the Matsya, or fish Avatāra, in a ship during the deluge; the account is in substance the same with that which is given in the Mātsya and other Purāṇas. Śeṣha then continues with the descendants of Ikṣhwāku, the order and names of whom conform most nearly with the same in the Bhāgavata*, although few details are given. Amongst them we have the story of Hariśchandra's sacrifice and elevation to heaven, and Saudāsa's transformation to a cannibal. The genealogy is then continued to the immediate predecessors of Rāma, and the greater part of the remainder of the work is then devoted to the history of that monarch, and the actions of himself and of the princes of his house.

The story of Dilīpa and his service of the cow

Nandiní, the birth and reign of Raghu, the marriage of Aja, and death of his wife Indumatí, and the birth of Daśaratha, are told exactly in the same manner as in the Raghu Vanśa*, and although in a less poetical style, yet frequently in the same words. In the account of Daśaratha we have a legend of his assailing Śani, or Saturn, who had caused a dearth, the king's car falling from heaven at the angry glances of the planet was upstayed by the bird Jaśáyú, and Daśaratha was thus enabled to accomplish his object, and partly compel and partly propitiate Śani to withdraw his obstruction to the fall of rain. These stories of Ráma's ancestors extend from the fifth to the end of the twelfth chapter, and from thence to the end of the 27th we have in the accounts of the birth of Daśaratha's sons, the actions of Ráma, his exile, his conquest of Lanká, and his return with Sítá to Ayo-dhyá, nothing more than an epitome of the Rámáyāna.

The compiler of the Purána appears, however, to have had again recourse to the Raghu Vanśa, for the events that occurred after Ráma's return to his capital, the dismissal of Sítá to the hermitage of Vál-míki, the death of the demon Lavaña by Śatrughna, and foundation of Mathurá, the birth of Ráma's sons, Kuśa and Lava, Sítá's being swallowed up by the earth, and Ráma's ascending to heaven with his followers and subjects.

* [I – III, VII f.]

 [XIV f.]

Vátsyáyana, unwearied of a tale of which Ráma is the hero, solicits further particulars from Śesha, and the snake-god details Ráma's return to Ayodhyá more fully, and dilates upon his meeting with his brother Bharata, and the widows of his father. He then describes the visit of Agastya to Ayodhyá, when the sage relates some of the circumstances of the history of Rávaṇa, in which the Uttara Khaṇḍa of the Rámáyana has been followed, with the addition that, Rávaṇa being a Brahman by birth, Ráma incurred, in putting him to death, a guilt which can only be expiated by an Aśwamedha. Accordingly the rite is described, and the horse intended for the sacrifice let loose, attended by a body of troops under the command of Śatrughna. The adventures of the steed and his attendants form the subject of a number of chapters, from the thirty-fifth to the ninetieth.

One of the first places of note to which the horse comes, is Ahichchhatrá, a city, which, according to the Mahábhárata*, lies north of the Ganges, and which here seems to be in Ásám, for adjoining to it is the temple of Kámákhyá, a form of Durgá, which has been long especially worshipped in that part of India. The temple it is said was constructed by Sumada, the king of Ahichchhatra, at the time of Śatrughna's arrival, in consequence of the goddess having restored him to his dominions, from which he had been driven by his foes. From hence Śatrughna marches to the banks of the Payoshní*, a river which, according to the Paurāṇik lists, rises from the Vindhya mountains, and is rather incongruously, therefore, placed in succession to Ásám. It is noticed, however, for the purpose of introducing the legend of the Muni Chyavana, which is narrated more fully here than in any other Purāṇa. The next place described is the Níla mountain and Purushottama Kshetra, or Jagannáth, which involves a legend of Ratnagríva, king of Káñchí (Conjeveram), who, going in pilgrimage to the mouth of the Ganges, makes a very extraordinary detour by the Gaṇḍakí river, all geography being here sacrificed to a determination to eulogize the Śálagráma, which sacred stone is commonly obtained in the Gaṇḍak. Śatrughna ascends the Níla mountain, and worships Purushottama. He next proceeds to Chakráṅka the capital of Subáhu, where the horse is detained by Damana, the son of Subáhu, and a fierce conflict ensues, which ends in the triumph of Śatrughna, and the recovery of the steed. We have then an account of Satyavat, king of Tejaspora, who was born to his father in reward of his cherishing a cow, the great importance of which is illustrated by a legend of Janaka, who, notwithstanding his being the father-in-law of Rāma, was condemned to hell for having struck a cow. His virtues, however, were such, as not only to make his going there a mere matter of form, but to enable him to redeem all the damned whom he beheld in Tartarus.

The horse is then stolen by the Asura Vidyunmālin, but the theft is detected and the demon slain. He then leads his guards to the hermitage of Āraṇyaka, who questions Śatrughna and his companions concerning Rāma, and in consequence repairs to Ayodhyā, where he is incorporated with the demigod. The steed next falls into the Narmadā, but is followed by the warriors to the caverns of the river-goddesses; and they restore the horse: he then becomes the subject of a still more formidable encounter, being carried off by Rukmāngada, the son of Vīramaṇi, king of Devapura. The heroes of Śatrughna's host are, in the first instance, victorious, and the king and his son are left for dead, when Śiva, of whom Vīramaṇi was a worshipper, comes with Vīrabhadra to the aid of his votaries. Pushkala, Śatrughna's chief captain, is beheaded by Vīrabhadra, and Śatrughna struck down senseless by Śiva, but Hanumān, after arresting Śiva's progress, brings the drug that reanimates the dead and restores his friends to life; the battle is renewed, but Śiva continuing to have the best of it, Rāma himself is obliged to appear. Śiva then retreats after offering worship to Rāma, and Vīramaṇi, who has been also revived, relinquishes the horse and his kingdom.

Several other stories of this kind occur. At last the horse comes to Válmiśi's hermitage, where he is detained by Lava, the son of Ráma, yet a youth. The mention of his name leads to a repetition of the story of Sítá's being separated from Ráma, with the addition of its cause, her having, when a girl, caught two parrots, and having let the male go, but kept the female; the latter, after pronouncing an imprecation on Sítá that she should be separated from her husband, died of grief, but repeating the name of Ráma to the last, went to heaven; the male threw himself into the Ganges; and was born again as a washerman in Ayodhyá, in which character he became the main agent in Sítá's exile, for discovering that his wife had spent some time in another man's house, he reviled, and beat her, and when his mother-in-law endeavoured to prevail upon him to forgive her daughter, he replied, "Not I. I am not the king. I am not Ráma, who took back Sítá after she had lost her character in the dwelling of the Rákshas." These words being reported to Ráma by his spies induced the king to send his wife away, and she was taken accordingly to the hermitage of Válmiśi, where she bore two sons, Kuśa and Lava. This part of the work agrees in some respects with the Uttara Ráma Charitra, but has several gossiping and legendary additions. Kuśa, coming to Lava's aid, they defeat all Śatrughna's warriors, including Sugríva and Hanumán, but by their mother's injunctions they release the horse, who is then conveyed to Ayodhyá, where Sumati, the counsellor of Śatrughna, reports to Rāma all that has happened to the party. The account of Kuśa and Lava excites Rāma's curiosity, and he sends for Vālmīki to inform him who they are. This leads to his discovery of his sons and his reunion with Sītā. The Aśwamedha takes place, but at the instant when Rāma is about to slay the victim, he becomes a celestial person, being a Brahman, condemned by Durvāsas, for hypocrisy, to wear the shape of a horse until released and sanctified by Rāma he goes to heaven. These details succeed an account of the reign of Kuśa, and a summary list of his successors, until the solar line ends with Sumitra in the ninety-seventh chapter. Here also closes the dialogue between Śesha and Vātsyāyana, the latter thanking the former for his narrations, and taking leave of him to wander over the earth.

The Rishis then ask Sūta to inform them what is the sum and substance of the Purāṇas. He is not allowed to answer in his own person, but repeats a dialogue between Śiva and Pārvatī on the subject, which at first is a repetition of a discourse between the sage Gautama and the sovereign Ambarīsha, in which the former details to the latter, at his request, the names of the eighteen Purāṇas, and the number of verses contained in each. There is one important peculiarity in this list; not only is the Bhāgavata placed last, but it is said, "Vyāsa first promulgated the Pādma, then sixteen others, and finally the Bhāgavata, as the extracted substance of all the rest, which he taught in twelve Skandhas or books, to his son Śuka." The merits of the Bhágavata as the text-book of the Vaishñava faith are then eulogized, and the particulars alluded to leave no doubt of the work intended, or of the priority of the Bhágavata to the Pátála Khañḍa of the Pádma Purána.

The conversation between Sadásiya and Párvatí is continued through all the remaining chapters, except the last. In reply to the inquiries of the latter, the former relates to her a description of Vṛindávana and some of the sports of Kṛishṇa amongst the Gopís, or milk maids of Gokula, in illustration of the character of the tenth book of the Bhágavata, which is dedicated to the life of that demigod. We have, however, anecdotes not found in that work, relating to Rádhá, the favourite mistress of Kṛishṇa, to the origin of the Gopís, and to the temporary transformation of Ná-rada and Arjuna to females. The distinguishing duties and characteristics of Vaishñavas, or followers of Vishṇu, and the efficacy of the Śálagrāma stone, of sectarial marks on the person, of chaplets and rosaries, of Tulasí, or sacred Basil, and of worshipping Vishṇu on certain days in each month, are then detailed at some length, and this Khañḍa, like the other, concludes with a tolerably copious chapter of contents.

Uttara Khañḍa. The last section of the Pádma Purána. This portion is more considerable than either of the preceding, consisting of 12,000 stanzas, distributed amongst 174 chapters.

Manuscripts of this portion of the Pádma Purána present a variety in their arrangement; some commencing with the legend of Jalandhara, as in the case of the copy of which I possess the index, and in that from which Col. Vans Kennedy has translated that story*: whilst the copy consulted on the present occasion begins with Dilśpa's going a-hunting and concludes with the narrative of Jalandhara. This order is confirmed by the Anukrama, or chapter of contents, with which the work concludes.

According to this copy, the Uttara Khaṇḍa commences, rather abruptly, it must be admitted, with Sūta's stating that after king Dilśpa had been crowned, he went forth from his capital to the chase. In the wood he met Vṛiddha Hárīta, a sage, who commended his having bathed in a pool in the forest, as ablution in the month of Mággha is peculiarly efficacious; he referred Dilśpa for further information on this point to the Muni Vaśishṭha, and the king accordingly repaired to that sage for instruction. Vaśishṭha's communications to Dilśpa on the subject of various observances which are to be held sacred by the worshippers of Viśhnū, and the virtue of which is illustrated by a number of legends, mostly of sectarial and comparatively recent origin, constitute the substance of this extensive but uninteresting compilation.

Vaśishṭha first relates to Dilśpa an account of Bhṛigu's residing in the Hīmálaya mountains, and enjoining a Vidyádharma, who has a tiger's head, to bathe in the month of Mágha, by which he gets quit of the deformity; he then repeats a story told by Dattatreya to Sahasrárjuna, of Řishíká, a Brahman female, who, in consequence of bathing in the month of Mágha, dwelt four thousand ages in Vaikuńtha, and was then born as the Apsaras Tilottamá, for the purpose of causing the mutual destruction of Sunda and Upasunda, an incident taken from the Mahábhárata*. Other legends to the same purport are then narrated, of which it will be sufficient to notice the following:—Śríkuńdala and Vikuńdala were the sons of a Vaiśya, who dissipated their property in profligate pleasures: after death, the former was sentenced to the Raurava hell, the latter to Swarga, much to his own surprise, as he had led the same abandoned life as his elder brother. He had, however, once bathed in the Jamná, in the month of Mágha, and hence proceeded his different destiny. Káncanamáliní became an Apsaras by bathing in the month of Mágha at Prayága, and by giving the merit of three days' ablutions to a Rákshas, she liberated him from that state, and enabled him to ascend to Swarga. Five Apsarasas endeavouring to compel the son of a Muni to return their affection, were cursed by him to become Piśáchís, they reiterated the imprecation, and the youth was also changed to a Piśácha. They were all redeemed from their metamorphosis by bathing at Prayága, in the month of Mágha, by the advice of Lomaśa Řishi. Chitrasena, king of Dráviḍa, was a pious and benevolent monarch, but unluckily, he listened to the persuasion of Śaiva ascetics, here termed Páshañḍas, or heretics, who maintained that no deity but Śiva should be worshipped, and Vishnú in particular should be shunned, and the Rájá and his people were not only converted from the adoration of Vishnú to that of Śiva, but demolished the temple of the former, and threw his images into the sea. Chitrasena, on his death, was punished by a sojourn in Tartarus, and by being then born as a Piśácha. Devadyuti, a Brahman, who had gained the especial favour of Vishnú, met with the Piśácha, and recommended him both by precept and illustration, to bathe at Prayága, in the month of Mágha, which he did, and was cleansed from his iniquities and transported to Swarga.

* [Quarterly Oriental Magazine. Calc.: 1825, Vol. IV, 243-65, and Vol. V, 1-20.]

Vaśishṭha next teaches Dilípa the greatest of all the Mantras, that which was imparted to Brahmá by Vishnú, by the former to Nárada, and by Nárada to the Rishis. This consists merely of the two names, Lakshmi and Náráyana, in the formula 'Om Lakshmi-náráyanaḥ Namaḥ', but it is declared to be the mystery of mysteries, and certain means of salvation. It may be communicated to all classes, to Śúdras and others, and to women, if they have faith in Vishnú. It must, however, be preceded by the ceremony of Díkshá or initiation, the essential part of which is the Tapta Mudrá, or stamping on the skin of the novice, at the part where the arms are set on to the chest, marks, with a heated iron, representing the conch and discus of Vishnú, a practice which is considered by the most respectable authorities to be a highly-reprehensible innovation.

In answer to Dilīpa's inquiry in what manner Bhakti, or faith in Vishnú, is best expressed, Vaśishtha repeats, in the beginning of the twenty-sixth chapter, a conversation that occurred on Kailása, between Śiva and Párvatī, on the same topic, in which the former describes to the latter the sixteen modes in which devotion to Vishnú is to be expressed. These are 1. being branded with the conch and discus; 2. wearing the Úrddha puñdra, the perpendicular streak or streaks of white clay and red chalk on the forehead; 3. receiving the initiating Mantra with those streaks; 4. ceremonial worship; 5. silent prayer, or counting a rosary of Tulasí seeds; 6. meditation, in which the figure and symbols of Vishnú are brought to the mental vision; 7. recollecting the names of Vishnú; 8. repeating them; 9. hearing them repeated; 10. hymning Vishnú; 11. adoring his feet, or prostration before his images; 12. drinking water that has washed the feet of his images; 13. eating the remains of food offered to Vishnú; 14. unbounded service of devout Vaishnávas; 15. fasting on the twelfth lunation, and keeping it sacred; 16. wearing necklaces and chaplets of the wood or seeds of the Tulasí. In the course of Śiva's explanation of these characteristic proofs of faith in Vishnú, he relates a number of tales illustrative of their efficacy, and expatiates on the sanctity of various objects and places venerated by the Vaishnáva sect.

In describing the frontal marks, Śiva mentions several places whence the earth should be taken, and the list is remarkable for containing the names of places in the south of India, as Venkaṭagiri and Śrīrangam. The prayer to be used is called the Eight-syllable Mantra, or 'Om Nārāyaṇāya namaḥ', and he who communicates it is the Achārya, no matter what his caste. The meaning of the prayer, and particularly of the term Om, is here explained in a characteristically mystical strain, and Viṣṇu is next described as the source and substance of all things. An account is then given of his residence, Vaikuṇṭha, and of his pastimes, or delusions, which are, in fact, all created beings: Viṣṇu, at the prayer of Mahāmāyā, or Prakṛiti, combining with her as Puruṣa, or soul, and engendering creation. He then sports with Mahānidrā, or sleeps on the waters, when a lotus springs from his navel, from which Brahmā makes his appearance, and the world is created; a detailed description ensues of the fourfold Vyūha, or disposition of Viṣṇu's residences, Vaikuṇṭha, Vaiśṇava loka, or a mythical Dwārakā, the white island, or Śwetadwīpa, and a palace in the sea of milk.

Śiva next relates to Pārvatī an account of the Vāibhavas or manifestations, Avatāras, or descents of Viṣṇu; of the first, or Mātsya, it is said that Viṣṇu, in the form of a fish, entered the ocean and destroyed Hiraṇyāksha, who had assumed the shape of the Makara, differing therefore from the usual account of the descent of Viṣṇu as a fish. In the descent of the Tortoise, an account is given of the churning of the ocean, the chief peculiarity in which is the birth of Jyeshthá Deví, the elder goddess, or Alakshmi, misfortune. The production of her more amiable sister, Lakshmi, prosperity, occurred on the twelfth lunation, and thence Śiva, at Párvatí's request, explains the sanctity of this and of the eleventh lunation, and the practices proper to be observed on those days. The goddess then inquires who are heretics, and the reply designates especially the followers of Śiva. Párvatí asks naturally enough how this should be, as they imitate her husband; and Śiva's explanation is, that he adopted the use of the skull, skin, bones, and ashes, by desire of Vishnú, to beguile Namuchi and other Daityas, who had obtained the mastery over the gods, but lost it by the heresy into which they were seduced by teachers inspired by Śiva, as Kaṇáda, Gautama, Śaktí, Upamanyu, Jaimini, Kapila, Durvásas, Mṛikaṇḍu, Vṛihaspati, and Jamadagni, authors of works in which the quality of darkness predominates. Works of this character are then specified, and are the treatises on the Pásúpata worship, or worship of Śiva, as Paśupati; Bauddha works; the Vaiśeshika, Vedánta, and Mīmáṃsá philosophies; the Bráhma and other Purāṇas, and the legal institutes of Gautama, Vṛihaspati, Samudra, Yama, Śankha, and Uśanas.

The Varáha and Nṛsinha Avatárs are then related, and in the latter we have the story of Prahláda, much in the same style as in the Vishnú P. The Vámana, or dwarf Avatára is next described at some length, and we have then the Avatára of Paraśuráma in some detail. The story of Rāma next occurs, and forms a complete epitome of the Rāmāyaṇa, and the birth, actions, and death of Kṛishṇa, agreeably to the text of the Bhāgavata, are last narrated. The Avatāras of Vishṇu constitute a considerable portion of the work, extending from the thirty-sixth to the seventy-second chapter.

The construction of the images of Vishṇu is next described, and the places are mentioned, where the principal are erected, as Śrīrangam, Kāśī, Jagannātha, where the image is of wood, Badarikāśrama, Gangā-sāgar, Dwārakā, Venkatādri, Vrīndāvan, &c. Bathing is enjoined in the Ganges, Yamunā, Śarayū, and Gaṇḍakī, in upper India, and in the Kāverī, Tāmraparṇī, Godāvarī, Kṛishṇā, and Narmadā, in the Dakhiṇ; worship is to be offered daily to Lakshmi and Nārāyaṇa, and the mode of so doing is fully detailed. Pārvatī then declares her intention of adoring Vishṇu, for which Sadāśiva commends her, and repeats to her the hundred and eight names of Rāma. The two deities then devote themselves to the adoration of Vishṇu, and the dialogue concludes with the seventy-fifth chapter.

The conversation is then resumed between Dilīpa and Vaśishṭha, and the king asks the sage how it happened that Śiva attained a form so unattractive and unlike a god. In reply the Muni tells him that at a great sacrifice made by Swāyambhuva Manu, the assembled Rishis discussed which of the deities was entitled to the homage of a Brahman; some said Rudra, some Brahmá, some Súra or the sun, and some Vishnú; but they all agreed that the only being whom they ought to revere was he who was made up of the quality of goodness; and they employed Bhṛigu to visit the deities, and put their characters to the test. Bhṛigu accordingly went to Śiva, but could not obtain access to him, as he was engaged with his wife; finding him, therefore, to consist of the property of darkness, Bhṛigu sentenced him to the form of the Linga, and pronounced that he should have no offerings presented to him, nor receive the worship of the pious and respectable. His next visit was to Brahmá, whom he beheld surrounded by sages, and so much inflated with his own importance as to treat Bhṛigu with great inattention, betraying his being made up of the quality of foulness. The Muni therefore excluded him from the worship of the Brahmans. Repairing next to Vishnú, he found the deity asleep, and, indignant at his seeming sloth, Bhṛigu stamped upon his breast with his left foot and awoke him. Instead of being offended, Vishnú gently pressed the Brahman's foot, and expressed himself honoured and made happy by its contact; and Bhṛigu, highly pleased by his humility, and satisfied of his being impersonated goodness, proclaimed Vishnú as the only deity to be worshipped by men or gods, in which decision the Munis, upon Bhṛigu's report, concurred. This subject extends to the seventy-sixth chapter, and in some copies forms the concluding section. It is not the last of my copy, however, for Vasiṣṭha having briefly recapitulated the subjects on which he has indoctrinated Dilīpa, asks him what more he desires to hear, on which Dilīpa expresses a wish to be made acquainted with the Māhātmya of the Bhagavad Gītā. Vasiṣṭha replies by repeating another dialogue between Śiva and Pārvatī, in which Śiva reports a conversation between Viṣṇu and Lakṣmī, the former of whom describes to the latter the holiness of the composition of Vyāsa, called the Bhagavad Gītā, and exemplifies its sanctity by legends of individuals who were purified from sin, or released from future existence, by hearing or reading one or other of the sections of the Gītā, beginning with the first, and proceeding regularly in succession to the last. There is nothing worthy of note in these stories; they are all purely sectarial, according to Vaiṣṇava notions. The scene of many is laid in the south of India, at Pratiṣṭhāna, on the Godāvarī; at other places on that river, at Śrī Śailam, at Mahiṣmatī, on the Narmadā, at Haripur on the Tungabhadra river, at Saurāṣṭra (city, or Surat,) in the country of Gurjara, and at other cities, said to be in the Dakṣiṇ, but which are perhaps fabulous, as Amarddaka and Meghankuśa; Kōlapur may perhaps admit of verification. The subject extends to the ninety-third chapter.

Sadāśiva then repeats to Pārvatī the thousand names of Viṣṇu, as recited by Nārada to Bhṛigu and other sages, and the reply made by the same holy person to a number of questions put by the Rishis, the general purport of which is the transcendent merit of one who constantly recites the names of Vishnú, wears the sectarial marks, and addresses to Vishnú all his thoughts, words, and deeds. This part includes the Kriyá Yoga Sára Máhátmya, or the efficacy of studying a subsequent portion of the Pádma Purána, and therefore eulogized here rather out of its place. The whole is nothing more than a reiteration of what has been repeatedly said before, though it proceeds to the end of the one hundred and first chapter.

The subject is still further prosecuted, and the merit of worshipping Vishnú, the certain expiation of all sin thereby, and the faults by which its efficacy is impaired, are communicated to Nárada by Sanatku-mára, as he had been taught them by Śiva. We have then two chapters on the unlawfulness of taking away life, consisting chiefly of an account given by Durgá of herself to Śiva, in which she ascribes her sanguinary exploits, as the death of various Asuras, to the Máyá, or illusion of Vishnú, by which those who worship him are not to be beguiled. Śiva then explains to Nárada what Bhakti or faith in Vishnú means, and what practices are incompatible with it; the various modes of worshipping Vishnú; the manner of meditating upon him, or inaudibly repeating his names; the rules of personal purification; the reverence to be shown to a Guru, or spiritual guide; the hundred and eight names of Kṛishná, which should be repeated every morning; the mystical marks on the soles of Kṛishná's feet, which should also be called to mind; the duty of morning ablution, and merit of washing with water in which a Śálagráma has been immersed. The subjects continue to the end of the one hundred and thirteenth chapter.

Dilípa then inquires of Vaśishthá what are the most efficacious means of obtaining final emancipation; to which the Muni replies by relating the Máhátmya of the month Kártikeya, as it was imparted to Nárada by Brahmá. In this month whatever gifts are made, whatever observances are practised, if they be in honour of Vishnú, are sure of attaining the end desired, and realizing an imperishable reward. Amongst the especially sacred acts of this month is the gift of lighted lamps. No particular day is enjoined in the section that treats of the Dípa dána Máhátmya, but the eleventh of the moon's wane is alluded to as especially appropriate, and the merit is great even if the lamps be lighted for the purpose of gambling at night in any place dedicated to Vishnú. The fourteenth and fifteenth lunations are also noted as holy days; but the general instruction is, "let a man offer lamps day and night in the month of Kártik." Some legends are narrated in illustration of this general precept, as well as of the efficacy of certain days of the month; thus, the thirteenth dark lunation is specified as the day on which Yama is to be worshipped with offerings of lamps. Bathing is enjoined early in the morning of the fourteenth and fifteenth lunations, and flowers and water are to be then also presented to Yama; lamps are to be offered at night to the deities generally. On the morning of the first light lunation or new moon, bathing is to be performed; libations are to be made to gods, men, and progenitors; the monthly obsequies are to be celebrated; Brahmans entertained; a number of lamps lighted at night in houses, gardens, cow-sheds, meetings of public roads, and holy places; and families are to keep awake through the night, and pass it in diversion, especially in games of chance. As these directions were given by Vāsishṭha to a certain female, they suggest to Nārada to inquire by what means women become beautiful, fortunate, fruitful, and faithful. Brahmá tells him a story, in reply, of a lady called Subhará, who was all these, in consequence of duly observing the Sukha-rátri, the happy night which Vishnu passes with Lakshmi, and which occurs on the fifteenth of the dark half of Kártik. The ceremonies on this occasion, consisting chiefly of the worship of Maháalakshmi, and including illuminations, are to be conducted especially by women. On the first of the moon's increase, Bali the Daitya is to be worshipped in commemoration of his gifts to Vishnu, as the dwarf, which took place on that day. Krishna is also to be worshipped as Gopála the cow-herd. On the second lunation, which is thence called Yama dwitíya, Yama is to be adored by those who wish to know not death; and on the eleventh the waking of Vishnu from his periodical slumbers is to be celebrated.

The account of these sacred days in the month of Kártik extends to the one hundred and twenty-sixth chapter.

The Kártika Máhátmya, however, is still considered to be the appropriate title of this portion of the Purana, although most of the chapters treat of topics not exclusively relating to that month. They describe the objects of Vaishṇava ceremonies and observances, which are equally sacred at other seasons, as the Dhátrī flower, the Śálagráma stone, the various kinds of Śálagramas, the conch shell, the Tulasí plant, various perfumes, as sandal, agallochum, and different fragrant flowers, all which are peculiarly dedicated to Vishṇu, and are to be worshipped or offered in worship on occasions and in modes which are particularized. A description is then given of the Bhíshma pañchaka, or five days from the beginning of the eleventh to the end of the fifteenth lunation of the month of Kártik, dedicated to the worship of Bhíshma; and this properly closes the subject of the holiness of Kártik, or the Kártika Máhátmya, with the one hundred and thirty-second chapter.

In reply, however, to a question of the Řishis, Síta relates to them the communication of the legend of Kártika by Nárada, to the wives of Kṛishna at Dwá-raka, and a conversation that ensued between Kṛishna and Satyabhámá, in which the divinity gives his wife an account of her former existence as the daughter of a Brahman, and her having been exalted to her present dignity in consequence of observing the ceremonies proper to the eleventh lunation of the month of Kártik. Satyabhámá asks how this month obtained its peculiar sanctity; in reply to which, Kṛishṇa relates to her the story of the Aśura Śankha having stolen the Vedas, and Vishnú's becoming a fish, in order to plunge into the sea and recover them. In this version of the Mátsya Avatára we have the sage Kaśyapa substituted for Satyavrata, and he throws the fish, when it is too large for the pond, into the sea: we have nothing further of a boat or a deluge—the fish kills Śankha, and brings the Vedas back to the gods. This happened in the month of Kártika, and on the eleventh day, whence bathing in that month and on that day is commemorative of this Avatára. Bathing at Prayága and Badarikásrama are peculiarly enjoined; and then Nárada, who has been the narrator of the previous story, which Kṛishná has only repeated, describes to Príthu the mode of observing the ceremonies, or the fasting, bathing, giving presents, waking, and worshipping, which should be practised in this month. These topics proceed to the one hundred and fortieth chapter. Príthu then asks Nárada to explain to him how the Tulasí plant became sacred to Vishnú. Nárada, in illustration, tells him a long legend of the birth, exploits, and death of Jalandhara, a person of whom no mention occurs in any other Purána, but whose story has been translated into English by Col. Vans Kennedy. The translation frequently varies from the text of the copy I have consulted, but the variations are not material to the narrative, and it is sufficient to refer to the translation for the details of the story—a story which, whether as it occurs in this place, or in the beginning of the work, appears extremely incongruous with its general tenour, and little, if at all, connected with what precedes or follows: occupies nine chapters: at the close it appears that Vishnú was fascinated with the beauty of Vfindá, the wife of Jalandhara; to redeem him from which enthrallment the gods applied to Lakshmi, Gaurí, and Swadhá; each gave them seeds to sow where Vishnú was enchanted. Those given by Lakshmi came up as the Dhátrí, Málátí, and Tulasi plants, and appearing in female forms they attracted Vishnú's admiration, and diverted his affections from Vfinda; hence the estimation in which they are to be held by all devout Vaishnávas. Nárada then relates to Prithu a series of stories still in illustration of the merit of acts of devotion in the month Kártik, in which again we have indications of the locality of the origin of this composition in the choice of sacred places in the Dakhín for the scenes of the wondrous events narrated; as the Sahya mountain; Śauráshtra; the confluence of the Krishná and Vení rivers; Káncí; the capital of a prince called Chola, king of Chola, the brother of Anantaśayana. The account winds up with a legend of the origin of the Krishná, Vení, and Kakudminí rivers, which were formed of portions of Vishnú, Śiva, and Brahmá, whilst the numerous streams of the Sahya mountain proceeded from portions of their several goddesses.

Krishná and Satyabhámá appear again in the one hundred and fifty-seventh chapter, as interlocutors, and the former expatiates to the latter on the three vratas or observances which he most prizes—those of the months Kártik and Mágha, and of the Ekádaśi or eleventh lunation, throughout the year. He then explains to her the manner in which the character of an individual is affected by that of those with whom he associates, and the possibility of interchanging vices and virtues, or of transferring to others the consequences of one's own acts, a doctrine frequently advanced and illustrated in this work. He exemplifies the theory by the narrative of Dhaneśwara, a Brahman of low occupation, who goes to Máhishmatí, in the month Kártik, to sell skins, and his business leading daily to the banks of the Narmadá, he is thrown into the company of numerous Vaishnávas—hears them constantly recite the name of Vishnú—sees them bathing and offering worship—and joins them, more out of curiosity than devotion, in their rites. Upon his death, and condemnation to Tartarus, it is found that the punishments of hell have no effect upon him, and upon inquiry into the cause, Yama learns his accidental observance of the month of Kártik: he is accordingly dismissed from the lower regions, and becomes one of the inferior divinities called Yakshas. Kṛishná and Satyabhámá then go to perform the evening Sandhyá, and Síta and the Rishis resume their dialogue in chapter one hundred and sixty.

Síta now explains how the Kártika-vrata is to be observed by sick persons, or those who dwell in mountains and forests, which is illustrated by a legend of the metamorphosis of portions of Vishnú, Śiva, and Brahmá, to trees, or severally to the Aśwattha (Ficus religiosa), Vatā (F. Indica), and Palāśa (Butea frondosa), by the curse of Párvatī. Another legend of Daridrā, or Poverty, left by Uddálaka, a Muni, to whom she had been espoused under an Aśwattha tree, explains why that tree is to be touched only on a Sunday, for on every other day Poverty or Misfortune abides in it: on Sunday it is the residence of Lakshmī. This concludes the Kártika Māhātmya with chapter one hundred and sixty-one.

The next subject is the history of Radha, the favourite mistress of Kṛishná, who is said to be Mahálakshmī, born as the daughter of the Rájá Vṛishabhānu and Śríkírttidā; she was born on the eighth of the moon's increase in the month Bhádra, and the work therefore describes the Bhádrashtamī vrata, or the ceremonies to be observed on Rádhā's birth-day, with the prayers and worship to be addressed to her and to Kṛishná, including the catalogue of her hundred and eight appellations: similar injunctions are then given for the observance of Kṛishná's birth-day on the eighth day of the dark half of the same month, and the three circumstances by which it is modified, as the simple Ashtamī, Rohinī, and Jayantī, or the concurrence of the asterism Rohinī with the eighth lunation and the moon's entering the constellation at midnight, are described. The holiness of the forest of Vṛindávan, the favourite haunt of Kṛishná and Rádhā, is the next topic, and we have then the one hundred and eight names of Annapúrnā, a form of Lakshmī. Suta then communicates to the Rishis the the sanctity of another month of bathing, fasting, and worshipping Vishnú, proper to be observed in Vaisákha, illustrating it by Vaishnáva tales, showing how various persons were purified from their sins by the efficacy of acts performed in Vaisákh. The Vaisákha Máhatmya ends with the one hundred and seventy-second chapter. The next chapter contains the Anukrama or index, and the one hundred and seventy-fourth or last chapter consists of a panegyric upon the Uttara Khaṇḍa of the Pádma Purána.

The Kriyá Yoga Sára is always considered as a sort of supplement to the Pádma Purána, or as a portion of the Uttara Khaṇḍa of that Purána. It is divided into twenty-five chapters, and contains about 4000 stanzas. It commences with Síta's visit to Naimisháranya, where Śaunaka, on behalf of the Rishis, asks him to inform them how, in an age so degenerate as the Kali, religious merit may be attained, mankind being now incapable of those arduous acts of devotion which were commonly practised in more auspicious ages. Síta replies by reciting a dialogue between Vyása and Jaimini, in which Vyása, to satisfy the similar inquiries of his disciple, repeated to him the Kriyá Yoga Sára Purana, or Purána explanatory of practical devotion, in opposition to the Dhyána Yoga, or devotion of contemplation.

Practical devotion is, according to this authority, the adoration of Vishnú. It was exercised before the creation by Brahma, upon Vishnú's destroying the demons Madhu and Kaitabha, and the notice of this circumstance is accompanied by a brief description of the origin of the world, and the birth and destruction of the two demons.

The first act of devotion enjoined is bathing in the Ganges, or celebrating the virtues of the sacred stream, especially at three places—Haridwára, Prayága, and Gangáságara. The holiness of the river is chiefly explained by insipid and extravagant legends, of Swarga, Vaikuñtha, and even final liberation, being the reward of different persons, several of whom were most abandoned sinners, who were sprinkled, on their deaths, with Ganges water—who were drowned in the river—or whose bones were cast into it. These stories extend from the third to the end of the eighth section.

A series of precepts and illustrations occupies the next five chapters on the worship of Vishnú in each month of the year, describing how it is to be performed, and what recompense rewards it. The next chapters explain the merits of the simple repetition of the words Hari, Ráma, Kṛishná, and other names of Vishnú; the efficacy of Bhakti, or faith in Vishnú; the holiness—of Purushottama Kshetra, and Jagan-nátha; the virtue of liberality, and excellence of various kinds of gifts, with the reward that awaits donations to Vaishnávas and to Vishnú; the reverence due to Brahmans; the sanctity of the Ekádaśí, or eleventh lunation. In the story of Kofíraṭha and his queen Suprajná, who faithfully observed the Ekádaśí, a description of hell, and the punishments inflicted on the damned, is given. The virtues of the Tulasí and Dhātrī plants, and merit of planting, and cherishing them, and wearing rosaries and necklaces made of their wood, are the theme of the twenty-third chapter. The next chapter details the duties of hospitality, and the work closes with an account of the decline of virtue in the different ages, and the depravity of mankind in the Kali Yuga. That period has, however, its advantages, for the recompense of years of devotion in the preceding ages is realized by a single repetition of the name of Hari*.

There can be little doubt that the two last portions of the Pádma Purána have not much in common, beyond their sectarial tendency, with those by which they are preceded, and it may be questioned if there is any very close connexion even between the four first Khañdas, and whether they can be regarded as constituting one continuous work: at any rate it is clear, that neither individually nor collectively do they correspond with the description of a Purána, or embody a representation that can be regarded as ancient or authentic of Hindu tradition and mythology. They are all evidently the compositions of a particular sect, and for a particular purpose — authorities compiled by the Vaishnávas for the promulgation of the worship of Vishnú.

The Śrīshṭi Khañda, or first portion of the work, is the most free from a sectarial character, and conforms best to that of a Purāṇa. The earlier and later chapters, indeed, treating of the creation, regal genealogies, and legends which appear to be ancient, mostly employ language used in several of the Purāṇas, the original property in which it is difficult to assign to any one of them, and perhaps of right belongs to none, having been borrowed from some common source. In the case of the Pādma Purāṇa, however, it is strongly to be suspected that the compiler had before him especially the Vāyu, Vishṇu, and Bhāgavata Purāṇas.

A very considerable portion of the Śrīṣṭi Khaṇḍa is, however, as far as can be ascertained, original, although it be not Paurāṇik, for it constitutes the Paushkara Māhātmyam, or the golden legend of the lake of Pushkara or Pokhar in Ajmīr*, where alone Brahmā is worshipped; and it is a peculiarity of this part of the work, that its sectarianism is the worship of Brahmā rather than of Vishṇu. There are some curious legends, as has been observed, of apparent struggles for supremacy between the followers of Brahmā and Śiva, in which, though the latter triumphs, yet it is at the expense of some humiliation.

The advocacy of the adoration of Brahmā, growing out of the legendary sanctity of a place dedicated to that divinity, is a probable clue to the history of the composition, and gives reason to suppose that this part of the Pādma Purāṇa owes its origin to the temples at Pokhar, legends intended to enhance the merit of acts of devotion at that shrine having been blended not very congruously with others taken from different sources, and embellished according to the taste of the compilers: when this is likely to have been accomplished, is a matter of some uncertainty. Pokhar is still a place of pilgrimage, and a shrine of Brahmá, but it was probably not much resorted to during the Mohammedan supremacy in the vicinity of Ajmír, and the worship of Brahmá has not been popular for some centuries at least. On the other hand, if narratives, legends, and genealogies have been borrowed literally from other Puráñas, including the Vishnú, as appears probable, we cannot go very far back for its composition.

There are also various descriptions and allusions, from which a comparatively modern origin may be inferred. Ráma is said to have recognised Śiva as the guardian of the bridge between Lanká and the peninsula, giving him the name of Rámeśwara, and the temple at that place, which still exists, must therefore have been built when the legend was written. Amongst the wives or favourites of Vishnú Rádhá is named, and her deification there is reason to believe modern. The Brahmans who live to the south of the Vindhya mountains are declared unfit to be invited to a Śráddha, or obsequial feast, an exclusion implying a difference of faith or practice, which is not to be traced in older authorities, and which was probably levelled especially at the Śaiva and Vaishnáva sects of the peninsula. The followers of Śiva, who are characterized by carrying a skull, are possibly not of high antiquity; and the specification of the Jain heterodoxy, with the description of a class of their priests carrying a bunch of peacocks' feathers, are indications of no remote date. We have also frequent mention of Mlechchhas, or barbarians, and Savitrī pronounces, in the seventeenth chapter, an imprecation upon Lakshmī, the goddess of propriety, that she shall take up her abode with them—this looks like an allusion to the presence and predominant authority of the Mohammedans when the passage was written, and there seems reason to believe that this portion of the Purāṇa was compiled at some period between the establishment of the Mohammedan kingdom of Delhi in the thirteenth and the fifteenth or sixteenth century.

The Bhūmī Khaṇḍa bears even less of the character of a Purāṇa than the preceding, containing very few of those details which belong to the ancient mythological system, and being still more extensively made up of sectarial legends. Its sectarianism is Vaishṇava, and is more decided than that of the Śrīshī Khaṇḍa. It is less controversial and exclusive, however, and Śiva is more civilly treated, and admitted to share with Viṣṇu the adoration of mankind.

Brahmā is scarcely noticed at all, and then only to be identified with Viṣṇu.

The character of the stories which constitute the greater portion of this work, and the additions made to those narratives which are borrowed from older compositions, sufficiently evidence the absence of antiquity. We have also repeated the specification of Jain doctrines, and may therefore infer that these enjoyed some degree of popularity at the time when they were thus assailed. The locality of the Bhūmī Khaṇḍa is different from that of the Śrīśhṭī, and instead of Pushkara, the places to which the greatest sanctity is attributed are situated along the Narmadā, and in central and western India. Amongst these Mahākāla is specified, which may possibly be the shrine of Śiva, at Ujjayinī, that was demolished by Sultan Altmish, in 1231. A shrine of Durgā, under the name of Kāmākhyā, which lies in Āsām *, is also mentioned, and it may be doubted if that or several of the other Tīrthas specified were in possession of celebrity at any remote era. The date of the Bhūmī Khaṇḍa then probably differs little from that of the preceding portion: it does not seem, however, to be necessarily connected with it, but to have been the work of different hands in a different part of India, and under circumstances somewhat dissimilar. It may be doubted also if it is the Bhūmī Khaṇḍa alluded to in the first chapter of the Śrīśhṭī, for although it does contain a description of the earth and of sundry Tīrthas, yet, as will have been seen by the abstract of its contents, they occupy but a small part of that of which, according to the specification referred to, they ought to have constituted the substance.

The opening of the Swarga Khaṇḍa with the precise

story of the drama of Sakuntalá, shows that it is posterior to the play. The travels of Bharata appear also to be borrowed from other and probably still later originals, and their boundary, Vaikuṇṭha, the heaven of Vishnu, placed above all the other Lokas, is a later and sectarial addition to the genuine Paurāṇik system. The narratives that follow do belong to the old legendary stock, but the long conversation between Mándhātří and Nárada, which forms the connecting thread of the latter half of the Swarga Khaṇḍa, is an original embellishment. The Vaishṇava observances, the worship of the Śálagrāma stone, the use of frontal marks, the holiness of the eleventh lunation, are not only sectarial, but, as far as has yet been ascertained, are modern, having been adopted by some of the Vaishṇava sects, which sprung up after the appearance of Ramānuja in the middle of the twelfth century. We have no reason therefore to assign to this part of the Pádma Purāṇa a higher antiquity than to the former, and it seems to be connected with the Bhumi Khanda in order and in subject. It corresponds also well enough with the brief description given of it in the first chapter of the Śríshtí Khaṇḍa.

The Pátála Khaṇḍa is little else than a history of Ráma, and of his house, the details of which are, to a great extent, taken from the Raghu Vanśa, and, as already observed, in the very same words. The Purāṇa is therefore more modern than the poem. The plan of the adventures of the horse turned loose for Ráma's Aśwamedha, which constitute a large portion of the Patála Khaṇḍa, appears to be original, as are most of the stories, although some of them are only embellished versions of legends to be met with elsewhere. Some of the places noticed afford a limit to the antiquity of the work. Kámákhyā, as has been stated, is probably no very ancient shrine, and certainly Jagannāth has no pretensions to high antiquity. We have also the Śálagráma, the sectarial marks, and the Tulasí plant, made the subjects of repeated panegyric, and the use of these is characteristic of modern Vaishṇava sects. The Bhágavata Puráña is also named and distinctly particularized, and the Pátála Khaṇḍa of the Pádma is therefore more modern than the Bhágavata. Except the ancestors of Ráma, there are no genealogies in this Khaṇḍa, and its congruity with the description in the Śríshtí Khaṇḍa is therefore rather questionable.

The Khaṇḍas of the Pádma Puráña, thus far, are Vaishṇava works. The first Khaṇḍa, it is true, almost drops that character in the importance attached to Pushkara and the worship of Brahṇa, but the three next are obviously written to assert the supremacy of Vishṇu. There is a tolerable conformity amongst the three in the tone in which this is enforced, and they also agree in the choice of Ráma rather than of Kṛishṇa for the form of Vishṇu that is selected as the subject of their panegyric. It seems likely, therefore, that they are nearly cotemporary productions, and that they originated with the followers of Rámānuja, or Madhwáchárya, Vaishnáva teachers, in the South of India, in the twelfth century.

The moderation that pervades the injunctions of the preceding portions is no longer observed by the Uttara Khaṇḍa, and the worship of any divinity, except Vishnú, and of Śiva especially, is positively prohibited. It possesses equally little of the character of a Purāṇa, and is a violent sectarial work made up for the most part of legends, invented to inculcate the exclusive worship of Vishnú, the use of distinguishing Vaishnáva marks, and the sanctity of particular seasons when Vishnú should especially be propitiated. The latter subjects in the legends, or Máhátmyas, of the months Mágha and Kártik constitute the bulk of the compilation.

The main purport and evident locality of this section sufficiently illustrate the probable period of its composition within certain limits, and show that it was written when a struggle took place between the Śaivas and Vaishnavas of the Peninsula for superiority. One legend, indeed, relates to a king of Dráviḍa, who, listening to the doctrines of heretics (Śaivas), destroyed the temples of Vishnú, and threw his images into the sea. The time at which these contests took place appears to have been about the eleventh and twelfth centuries (Mackenzie Collection, Introduction, LXII.)

rently some eight or nine centuries ago. (As. Res. XVI, 12.)

The principal places at which worship is addressed to Vishṇu include Śrīrangam and Venkatādri, or Tripetī. The traditions of the latter acknowledge that it was a Śaiva shrine in the time of Rāmānuja, who recovered it for the Vaishṇavas, and, consequently, the Uttara Khaṇḍa is posterior to that event and to the twelfth century.

The scenes of many of the legends illustrating the merit of worshipping Vishṇu are laid in the South, and amongst them we have Haripur on the Tunga-bhadrá. In the translated index this is called Hariharapur, and whichever reading be correct, it appears probable, from its situation on the Tungabhadrá, that the capital of Vijayanagara is intended, the city of Bukka and Harihara Rāyas, which was founded in the beginning of the fourteenth century*.

These, as well as the general character of the work and its dwelling upon the sanctity of the Sālagráma stone, Tulasí plant, and other particulars, afford proof sufficiently credible, that it is not entitled to be considered as the composition of a remote period. The fifteenth century will not, in all probability, be very far from the highest antiquity to which it can lay claim.

The Kriyá Yogá Sāra seems to have been suggested by the chapters of the Uttara Khaṇḍa, which treat of practical devotion according to Vaishṇava tenets. In that case, it is posterior to it, and there is nothing in it inconsistent with a more modern date. Its tone is more moderate, however, and from its dilating more especially upon the holiness of the Ganges, and of Jagannátha Kshetra, and not alluding to other holy places, it differs in the locality of its origin from the other Khaṇḍas, and is most probably the work of a Brahman of Orissa, or Bengal. The work does not appear to be known in the South of India.

* [Lassen, Ind. Alt. IV, 164 ff.]

III. AGNI PURĀÑA.

THE Agni Purāṇa, or more correctly, in a derivative form, the Āgneya Purāṇa, is one of the eighteen principal Purāṇas. Although, in common with the other compositions so termed, it is attributed to Vyása, it is narrated as usual by his disciple Súta, and was received by him from the Muni Vaśishṭha, to whom it was communicated by Agni, whence its denomination.

According to the assertion of its own text the Āgneya Purāṇa contains fourteen thousand stanzas; the Bhágavata and other authorities give it 15000 or 16,000. The copy to which this account refers has about the former number.

The text is divided into a number of small sections, according to the subject, but without any enumeration :

the number of them in the present instance amounted to 332. Colonel Wilford speaks of a supplement, and of a chapter, apparently the same, which he calls the 63rd, or last. The supplement, however, from which he derives his account of the modern princes of India up to the Mohammedan invasion, is no part of the work to which the name of Ágneya Purāṇa is applied. It is clearly a distinct and subsequent composition.

The Ágneya Purāṇa is interesting from the variety of the subjects of which it treats, and in which it deviates very materially from the definition given by its own reputed author of the contents of a Purāṇa. These Agni declares to be five: primitive creation; subsequent creations; the genealogies of demigods and kings; the reigns of the Manus, and the histories of royal dynasties*. These, however, occur but imperfectly in the body of this work, and the far greater portion of its contents is of a widely different character.

After the usual opening the Ágneya Purāṇa describes the ten Avatāras, and in the relation of those of Rāmachandra and Kṛishṇa follows avowedly the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata, being consequently posterior to those works.

The ensuing chapters relate to the worship of Kṛishṇa, as Nārāyaṇa or Vishṇu, this Purāṇa being of the Vaishṇava class: at the same time it leans very favourably to the worship of Śiva, as the Linga, and is full of Tāntrika ceremonies in honor of that form of the deity. It was compiled therefore probably anterior to any wide separation between the Śaiva and Vaishṇava sects, and it was undoubtedly prior to that modification of the Vaishṇava faith, which pays such infinite veneration to Kṛishṇa as Gopāla, or Govinda, or Bāla Gopāla, the cowherd or the infant god; no allusion to whose worship has been found, nor has the name of his favourite mistress Rādhā once been encountered.

The ritual, including the ceremonies of the Homa, or burnt offering; the Mantras, or mystical formulæ; the Maṇḍalas, or mystical diagrams; the Pavitra, or purificatory thread; the erection and consecration of temples, images, tanks, gardens, flags, jars, &c. extends through a number of chapters; it is in its general purport Vaishṇava, but the Linga and several of the Tāntrika forms of Durgā are also especially revered; Mantras are abundantly introduced, as are the acts and gesticulations with which they are muttered or recited. The style in which they are narrated is however abrupt and obscure, and the ceremonial so confusedly and indistinctly laid down, that the whole has the appearance of a string of garbled extracts rather than of a systematic detail. There is a general correspondence between these chapters with those of the Śāradā Tilaka and Mantra Mahōdadhi, but it does not appear that they are identically the same.

This chapter is followed by the Bhuvana Kosha (the description of the universe,) which corresponds generally with the same in other Purāṇas, but is much less explicit than in some of them. This chapter comprises the Tírthas, or places of pilgrimage, of which however it enumerates very few, and those but briefly. It is worthy of notice that the Narmadá and Śrí Śaila are especially noticed, whilst the northern mountains are not mentioned, and also that Benares is called Avimukta * in its religious character; whence it may be inferred, that the chief shrine was that of Śiva, as Avimukteśwara, not Viśweśwara, the form that has been most popular for some centuries at least. The site of Benares was the same as at present, or between the Varaṇá and the Así rivulets.

The Máhátmyas, or legends of the few Tírthas noticed, are very brief, except that of Gayá, which is so very minute, that it may be suspected to be an interpolation, as it is not in keeping with the rest, nor with the manner in which all such subjects are usually disposed of in a Puráṇic miscellany. Such interpolations or rather appendages are not at all uncommon, although the legends are more frequently attached to some of the other Puráṇas, as the Brahmáṇḍa and Skánda. We have, however, a case in point with the Agni Puráṇa; there being current in the South of India a work called the Káveri Máhátmyam of the Agni Puráṇa, which is never found in the copies of the Puráṇa itself, and which indeed is very nearly as extensive as the whole work of which it is called a section **.

* [Weber, Ind. Stud. II, 73. Daśakumára charitam, c. 4 init.]

 [Mackenzie Collection I, 67.]

The Tīrthas are followed by the description of the Indian continent, and other portions of the world; also the distances and dimensions of the regions below and above it. The whole of this chapter has not been compared with other works, but in some passages, particularly the description of the sun's car, it is word for word the same with the text of the Vishṇu Purāṇa: being in other respects, however, much less full and satisfactory than that work.

The description of the sun and planets leads to the astronomical or astrological section, and that to magical rites and formulæ; from these the work proceeds rather abruptly to the periods of the Manwantaras, and then to the civil institutes of the Hindu caste, as birth, investiture, marriage, death, &c. the duties of the religious orders, and the contemplation of the deity, conformably to the tenets of the Vedānta: a long string of Vratas or religious obligations, both special and occasional, follows. The next subject discussed is that of gifts as religious duties, and this branch of the work finally closes with the description of corporeal austerities of a meritorious and pious complexion.

The next portion of the Āgneya Purāṇa treats at considerable length, and with many interesting particulars, of the duties of princes, beginning with the ceremonies of their coronation, and comprehending their civil and military obligations; it forms what constituted the Nīti of Hindu writers, (Polity or the art of government,) and is of a character with which Hindu ideas have long ceased to be familiar. Some of the details correspond accurately enough with those that occur in a passage of the *Dāśa Kumāra, and both are probably indebted to a common source, possibly the work ascribed to Chāṇakya, cited by the author of the Dāśa Kumāra. As the system is wholly unmixed with foreign notions, and is purely Hindu, it can only relate to a state of things anterior to the Mohammedan invasion; it is not a necessary consequence, it is true, that the Āgneya Purāṇa should bear a similar date, but it is an argument rather in favour of such a belief, and contributes with other grounds to authorize such a conclusion, if not for the whole work, for a very extensive portion.

The like genuine Hindu character belongs to the sections that follow on the shape of weapons and on archery, the phraseology and practice of which are no longer known. These sections of the Āgneya Purāṇa are indeed particularly valuable, as they preserve almost, if not quite, singly, the memory of former regal and martial usages.

The chapters on the subject of judicature and law are so far curious, that they are literally the same as the text of the Mitāksharā, ascribed to the Muni Yājñavalkya. The antiquity of that text is, in the estimation of the Hindus, extravagantly remote; but without reference to their belief, it is certainly not very modern, as passages have been found on inscriptions in every part of India, dated in the tenth and eleventh centuries. To have been so widely diffused, and to have then attained a general character as an authority, a considerable time must have elapsed, and the work must date therefore long prior to those inscriptions; at the same time; this throws little light on the period at which the Purāṇa was compiled, the author of which might in any day transcribe the code of Yājñavalkya, although it is possible, that so undisguised a transfer may have preceded the time at which the legislative code was in general and extended circulation.

The chapters on law are followed by a rather miscellaneous series regarding the perusal of the Vedas, the averting of threatened ill fortune, burnt-offerings, and the worship of various deities. We have then a short but curious chapter on the branches of the Vedas; and speaking of the Purāṇas, the following remarkable passage occurs: "six persons received the Purāṇas from Vyāsa, and were his pupils; their names are Sūta, Lomaharsha, Sumati, Maitreya, Śāṇśapáyana, and Sāvārhi." These, therefore, are probably the real authors of most, if not of all the Purāṇas. It is said also, that Śāṇśapáyana and others compiled a Sanhitá, or epitome of all the Purāṇas*.

The next chapter on gifts to be made, when the Purāṇas are read, contains the list of the Purāṇas and the enumeration of the stanzas they contain. In this respect many differences occur from similar enumera-

tions in other Purāṇas, and the Śiva Purāṇa is altogether omitted. With regard to the narrators and the chief subjects at least, in some cases, this detail varies from the text of the works as now found; these variations will be best noticed when we come to the respective Purāṇas to which they relate.

The list of the Purāṇas is followed by the genealogical chapters detailing the families of the Sun and Moon, but more particularly the latter, and especially the houses of Yadu and Puru to the time of Kṛishṇa and the Pāṇḍavas. These chapters agree generally with the dynasties usually detailed, but the lists are for the greater part very dry and abrupt, whilst few of the ordinary legends are preserved, and those so concisely as to be very obscure. There are some details relating to Kṛishṇa of a rather remarkable character. The time at which these chapters close leaves us no inference regarding the age of the compilation.

The next subject is medicine, taken avowedly from the instruction given by Dhanwantari to Suśruta, or from the medical work attributed to the latter; the extracts are, however, very injudiciously made, with an utter disregard of method; and with a perverse selection of every thing least important: it also alludes to the classification of medicaments as hot and cold, and although it does not attach the same importance to the system as is given to it in Mohammedan medicine, yet its introduction at all is rather in favour of its being derived from such a source, for it is not certain that the ancient writers Charaka and Suśruta laid any greater stress upon these particular properties, than they are entitled to, without reference to a theoretical system. The part of the Purāṇa likewise includes much mystic medicine or curing by charms.

Another set of chapters on mystic rites and formulæ follows, and on the worship of different forms of Śiva and Devī. The whole so incompatible with a Vaishṇava work that it is difficult not to suppose them additions by other and perhaps later hands.

Poetry and rhetoric form the next subjects, and conform to the systems usually received: the authority of Pingala is specified. The work concludes with a grammar, omitting the verbs: the system is that of Pāṇini and Kātyāyana: the commentator on Pāṇini is cited by name. The compilation is therefore posterior to the existence of the great body of Hindu poetical compositions, and to the consummation of the grammatical construction of the Sanskrit language.

From this general sketch of the Āgneya Purāṇa it is evident that it is a compilation from various works; that consequently it has no claim in itself to any great antiquity, although from the absence of any exotic materials it might be pronounced earlier, with perhaps a few exceptions, than the Mohammedan invasion. From the absence also of a controversial or sectarial spirit it is probably anterior to the struggles that took place in the 8th and 9th centuries of our era, between the followers of Śiva and Viṣṇu. As a mere compilation, however, its date is of little importance, except as furnishing a testimony to that of the materials of which it is composed. Many of these may pretend no doubt to considerable antiquity, particularly the legendary accounts of the Avatáras, the section on regal polity and judicature, and the genalogical chapters: how far the rest may be ancient, is perhaps questionable, for there can be little doubt that the Purána as it now exists, differing from its own definition of Purána, and comprehending such incongruous admixtures, is not the entire work as it at first stood. It is not unlikely that many chapters were arbitrarily supplied about 8 or 9 centuries ago, and a few perhaps even later; to fill up the chasms which time and accident had made in the original Ágneya Purána.

IV. BRAHMA VAIVARTTA PURÁÑA.

THE Brahma Vaivartta Purána is perhaps the most decidedly sectarian work of the whole collection, and has no other object than to recommend faith in Kṛishṇa and Rádhá: subservient to this purpose, it records a great variety of legends, of which no traces can be found in any of the other Puránas, and it deals but sparingly in those which are common to all. It is of little value as a collateral authority, therefore, and most of the stories it contains are too insipid and absurd to deserve investigation. It contains, however, a few remarkable passages that bear an ancient character, and it throws more light than any similar work upon the worship of the female principle or Prakṛiti, as well as of Kṛishná and Rádhá.

The Brahma Vaivartta is supposed to be communicated by Sauti, the son of Síta, the original narrator of the Purāṇas, to Śaunaka, a sage, at an assembly of similar characters, at the forest of Naimisha, whom he happens to visit, and who ask him to relate the work. This commencement opens several of the Purāṇas, and more especially the Māhātmyas or chapters descriptive of the virtues of some place or person, said to be taken from some Purāṇa. In this case the Ṛishis state, as the motive of their inquiry, their dread of the evil tendency of the present age, and their desire for emancipation; and their hope to be secured in the one, and defended from the other, by being imbued with Bhakti, or faith in Hari, through the medium of the Purāṇa, which they style the essence of the Purāṇas, the source of faith, felicity, and final liberation, and the dissipator of the errors of the Purāṇas, and the Upapurāṇas, and even of the Vedas!

Sauti acquired his knowledge of this work from Vyása, by whom it was arranged in its present form, to the extent of eighteen thousand Ślokas. Vyása received the Sūtra, the thread or outline of it, from Ná-rada, who had learnt it from Náráyaṇa Ṛishi, the son of Dharma, to whom it had been communicated by his father. Dharma had been made acquainted with it by Brahmá, who had been taught it by Kṛishná himself, in his peculiar and deathless sphere, the celestial Goloka:—a paradise, it may be observed, of which no trace occurs in any other Purāṇa. The Brahma Vaivartta is so named, because it records the manifestations of the Supreme Being in worldly forms, by the interposition of Kṛishná, who is himself the Supreme Spirit, the Parabrahma or Paramátmá, from whom Prakṛiti, Brahmá, Vishnú, Śiva, and the rest proceeded.

The Brahma Vaivartta Purāṇa is divided into four books or Khaṇḍas, the Brahma Khaṇḍa, the Prakṛiti Khaṇḍa, the Gaṇeśa Khaṇḍa, and the Kṛishná Janma Khaṇḍa, treating separately of the nature and acts of the supreme; of the female personification of matter; of the birth and adventures of Gaṇeśa; and of the birth and actions of Kṛishná. We shall notice the principal subjects of each division.

The Brahma Khaṇḍa begins with the creation of the universe, as taking place after an interval of universal destruction. The world is described as waste and void, but the Supreme Kṛishná, the sole existent and eternal Being, is supposed to be present, in the centre of a luminous sphere of immeasurable extent, and inconceivable splendor. From him the three qualities, crude matter, individuality, and the elements proceed; also Náráyaṇa or the four-armed Vishnú, in his ordinary garb and decorations, and Śankara, smeared with ashes, and armed with a trident. Náráyaṇa or Vishnú comes from the right, and Śiva from the left side of the primeval Kṛishná, and Brahmá springs from his navel: all the gods and goddesses in like manner proceed from his person, and each upon his or her birth utters a short prayer or hymn in honour of him: the following are the salutations of the three principal persons of the Hindu pantheon.

Nārāyaṇa's address to Kṛishṇa.

"I pay reverence to the cause of causes, to him who is at once the act and the object, the superior boon, the giver and meriter, and source of blessings; who is religious austerity, and its everlasting fruit, and himself the eternal ascetic; who is beautiful, black as a new cloud; delighted in his own spirit; who is void of desire, who assumes forms at will, who annihilates the five desires, and who is the cause of desire; who is all things, the lord of all things, and the unsurpassed form, which is the seed of all things, who is embodied in the Vedas, who is the seed of them, the fruit of the Vedas, and its bestower; who is learned in the Vedas, the ritual they enjoin, and the best of all who are conversant with their doctrines."

Śiva's address.

"I adore him, the invincible, the giver, the lord and cause of victory, the best of the bestowers of victory, and victory itself; who is the lord and cause of all things, lord of the lord of all things, and cause of the cause of all things; who is present in all, who upholds all, who destroys all, generates all, who is the cause of the preservation of all, who is all things; who is the fruit, the giver of the fruit, its seed, and its support; who is identical with light, the irradiator of all, and supreme of all those who shine with divine radiance."

Brahmā's address.

"I adore Kṛishṇa, who is free from the three qualities, the one imperishable Govinda, who is invisible and void of form, who is visible and assumed the shape of a cowherd, who seems a youth in years, who is of mild deportment, the beloved of the Gopīs, of lovely aspect, black as a new cloud, and beautiful as a myriad of Kandarpas. Inhabiting the place of the Rāsa in his sojourn in the groves of Vṛindāvan, the lord of the mystic dance, and its performer, and the delighter in the graces of its evolutions.

The other divinities continue in the same strain, and the tendency of the hymns furnishes a key to the whole work, the object of which is to identify the cowherd of Vṛindāvan with the supreme cause of the world, or to claim for Kṛishṇa a rank which the followers of Viṣṇu and Śiva demand, exclusively, for the object of their respective adoration: with much more reason, it must be confessed; for the actions of Kṛishṇa are even still more preposterously incompatible with a divine character than those of his competitors for pre-eminence.

After the several deities are produced from various parts of Kṛishṇa's person, he retires into the Rāsa-maṇḍala, a chamber or stage for the performance of a kind of dance, to which the followers of this divinity attach much importance, although it seems to be no more than a kind of dramatic representation of Kṛishṇa's dancing and sporting with the Gopīs. There Rādhā, his favourite mistress, proceeds from his heart; from the pores of her skin spring three hundred millions of Gopīs, or nymphs of Vṛindāvan, and an equal number of Gopas, the swains of the preceding, originate from the pores of Kṛishṇa's skin; the herds they are to attend owe their existence to the same inexhaustible source. The Rāsa and Rādhā, and the origin of the kine, and their keepers, male or female, are amongst the chief characteristic peculiarities of the Brahma Vaivartta Purāṇa.

After Kṛishṇa's thus evolving the different orders of subordinate deities, the work proceeds to describe the devotion of Śiva towards his creator, and takes this opportunity of expatiating upon the different degrees of Bhakti, or faith, and the various kinds of Mūkti, or salvation.

The work of creation is then resumed by Brahmā, who begets by his wife Sāvitrī a various and odd progeny, as the science of logic, the modes of music, days, years, and ages, religious rites, diseases, time, and death. He has also an independent offspring of his own, or Viśwakarmā, from his navel; the sage Sānanda, and his three brothers, from his heart; the eleven Rudras from his forehead, and sundry sages from his ears, mouth, &c.

The legends that follow relating to the daughters of Dharma, and their marriages with various patriarchs, from whom terrestrial objects proceeded, are told in the usual strain. In describing the origin of the mixed classes of mankind, this work contains a peculiar legend, which makes a certain number of them the issue of the divine architect Viśwakarmá by Ghritáchí, a nymph of heaven. The chapter often occurs as a separate treatise under the title of Jāti Nirñaya, and is considered as an authority of some weight with respect to the descent of the mixed tribes*, although of a purely legendary character.

The succeeding sections contain some legends of little importance, until the 16th, which is occupied with a short, but curious list of medical writers and writings. The first work on medical science entitled the Áyur Veda was, like the other Vedas, the work of Brahmá, but he gave it to Súrya, the sun, who, like the Phœbus of the Greeks, is the fountain of medical knowledge amongst the Hindus. He had sixteen scholars, to each of whom a Sanhitá or compendium is ascribed: none of the works attributed to them are now to be procured.

The chapters that next follow relate a legendary story of the wife of a Gandharva named Málavatí, the efficacy of various Mantras, the story of Nárada, the sage, and rules for the performance of daily purificatory and religious rites. The 28th and 29th chapters, the last of the book, are occupied with the description of

* [See the text in Aufrecht's Catal. Codd. Mss. Sanscrit. I, 21.]

Kṛishṇa, of his peculiar heaven or Goloka, of the holy Ṛishi Nārāyaṇa, and of his residence. The style and purport of the whole are peculiar to this Purāṇa, and similar to the address of the deities cited above. Goloka is said to be situated 500 millions of Yojanas above the Lokas of Śiva and Viṣṇu. It is a sphere of light, tenanted by Gopas, Gopīs, and cows; the only human persons admissible to its delights are pure Vaiṣṇavas, the faithful votaries of Kṛishṇa. It appears, however, that the author of this Purāṇa, who in all probability is the inventor of Goloka, had no very precise notions of his own work, as he calls it in one place square, and in another round; and whilst he is content in one passage to give it the moderate diameter of 30 millions of Yojanas, he extends its circumference in another to a thousand millions.

The next section of this Purāṇa is also of a peculiar character. It relates to Prakṛiti, the passive agent in creation, personified matter, or the goddess nature. The Purāṇas in general follow in regard to their cosmogony the Sāṅkhya school of philosophy, in which Prakṛiti is thus described: Prakṛiti or Mūla Prakṛiti is the root or plastic origin of all, termed Pradhāna, the chief one, the universal material cause. It is eternal matter, undiscrete, undistinguishable as destitute of parts, inferrible from its effects, being productive, but no production*.

According to the same system, the soul is termed

* [Sāṅkhya Kār. 3. Colebrooke's Essays, p. 153. Viṣṇu Pur. p. 10.]

Purusha or Pumán, which means man or male; but the Sáṅkhyā doctrine is twofold, one atheistical, the other theistical. The former defines the soul to be neither produced nor productive, not operating upon matter, but independent and co-existent; the latter identifies soul with Íśwara, or God, who is infinite and eternal, and who rules over the world: and it is to this latter system that the Purāṇas appertain, only in this Íśwara they recognise the peculiar object of their devotion, whichever of the Hindu triad that may be, or even, as in the work before us, superadding a fourth in Kṛishṇa, who is every where else regarded but as a manifestation of Vishṇu, and in a remarkable passage of the Mahābhārata is said to be no more than an Avatár of a hair plucked from the head of that divinity.

In the true spirit of mythology, which is fully as much poetical as religious, the figure of prosopopeia is carried by the Hindus to its utmost verge; and we need not wonder therefore to find spirit and matter converted by the Paurāṇik bards into male and female personifications, with the attributes adapted to either sex, or derived from the original source of either representation. Prakṛiti is consequently held to be not only the productive agent in the creation of the world, but she is regarded as Máyá, the goddess of delusion, the suggester of that mistaken estimate of human existence, which is referable to the gross perceptions of our elementary construction. With this character the Paurāṇiks have combined another, and confounding the instrument with the action, matter with the impulse by which it was animated, they have chosen to consider Prakṛiti also as the embodied manifestation of the divine will, as the act of creation, or the inherent power of creating, co-existing with the supreme. This seems to be the ruling idea in the Brahma Vaivartta, in which the meaning of the word Prakṛiti, and the origin of this agent in creation, are thus explained:—

“The prefix Pra means pre-eminent, Kṛiti means creating; that goddess who was pre-eminent in creation is termed Prakṛiti: again, Pra means best, or is equivalent to the term Sattwa, the quality of purity, Kṛi implies middling, the quality of passion, and Ti means worse or that of ignorance. She who is invested with all power is identifiable with the three properties, and is the principal in creation, and is therefore termed Prakṛiti. Pra also signifies first or foremost, and Kṛiti creation; she who was the beginning of creation, is called Prakṛiti.”

“The supreme spirit in the act of creation became by Yoga twofold, the right side was male, the left was Prakṛiti. She is of one form with Brahma. She is Māyā, eternal and imperishable. Such as the spirit, such is the inherent energy (the Śakti), as the faculty of burning is inherent in fire.” *

* [The original is quoted by Aufrecht, in his Catal. Bodl. p. 22, b and 23, a.]

The idea of personifying the divine agency, being once conceived, was extended by an obvious analogy to similar cases, and the persons of the Hindu triad being equally susceptible of active energies, their energies were embodied as their respective Prakṛitis, Śaktis, or goddesses. From them the like accompaniment was conferred upon the whole pantheon, and finally upon man; women being regarded as portions of the primeval Prakṛiti. The whole being evidently a clumsy attempt to graft the distinction of the sexes as prevailing in earth, hell, and heaven, upon a metaphysical theory of the origin of the universe.

The primeval Prakṛiti, according to our authority, which now becomes wholly mythological, resolved herself, by command of Kṛishṇa, into five primitive portions. These were Durgā, the Śakti of Mahādeva; Lakshmī, the Śakti of Viṣṇu; Saraswatī, the goddess of language; Sāvitrī, the mother of the Vedas, and Rādhā, the favourite of Kṛishṇa.

In the same manner as the primary creator of the world multiplies his appearances, and without losing any of his individual substance, occupies by various emanations from it different frames, so the radical Prakṛiti exists in different shapes, and in various proportions, distinguished as Anśas, portions, Kalās, divisions, and Kalānśas and Anśānśas, or subdivisions, or portions of portions. Thus Gangā, Tulasī, Manasā, Shashthī, and Kālī, are Anśarūpas, or forms having a portion of the original Prakṛiti; Swāhā, Swadhā, Dakṣiṇā, Swasti, a host of virtues and vices, excel-lences and defects, and all the wives of the inferior deities are Kalārūpas, forms constituted of a minor division of Prakṛiti; whilst all the female race are animated by her minuter portions, or subdivisions, and they are virtuous or vicious, according as the quality of goodness, passion, or ignorance, derived from their great original, predominates in the portion of which they are respectively constituted. Women who go astray, therefore, have by this system a better excuse than the stars.

The compiler of this Purāṇa is very little scrupulous as to the consistency of his narrative, and assigns to the principal goddesses other origins than that which he gives in the beginning of the Brahma Khaṇḍa, or in the first chapter of this section. Thus Saraswatī, who came out from the mouth of Kṛishṇa in the former, and in the latter is said to be one of the five subdivisions of Prakṛiti, is now described as proceeding from the tongue of Rādhā; and Lakshmi, who in one place is also a portion of Prakṛiti, and in another issues from the mind of Kṛishṇa, is described in this part of the work as one of two goddesses, into which the first Saraswatī was divided; the two being Saraswatī proper, and Kamalā or Lakshmi. These incoherencies are quite characteristic of this Purāṇa, which from first to last is full of contradictory repetitions, as if the writer was determined to make a large book out of a few ideas, the precise nature of which he forgot as fast as he committed them to paper.

After this account of the origin of the principal female forms, the third chapter contains a more particular description of the sphere of Kṛishṇa or Goloka. It then repeats an account of the creation of the world, through the agency of Brahmá; and the following chapters of the section are devoted to legendary stories of the principal Prakritis, or Saraswatí, Gangá, Tulasí, Sávitṛí, Lakshmi, Swáhá, Swadhá, Dakshiná, Shashthí, Mangalá, Chaṇdí*, Manasá, Surabhí, Rádhiká and Durgá. In the course of these narratives various others are introduced, illustrative of the characters of gods, saints, heroes, and heroines, all tending to show the fervour with which they worshipped Kṛishṇa. Accounts of Goloka, a description of hell, and an explanation of the chronological system of the Purāṇas, are interwoven; besides other subjects of a peculiar and legendary nature, conveying little information or amusement.

The third section of the Brahma Vaivartta Purāṇa is the Gaṇeśa Khaṇḍa, giving an account of the birth and actions of that deity, in a series of legends, which are not of frequent occurrence, and are in a great degree, if not altogether, peculiar to the work.

Párvatí after her marriage with Śiva, being without a child, and being desirous to obtain one, is desired by her husband to perform the Puṇyaka Vrata. This is the worship of Vishṇu, to be begun on the thirteenth day of the bright fortnight of Mágha, and continued for a year, on every day of which flowers, fruits, cakes, vessels, gems, gold, &c. are to be presented, and a thousand Bráhmañas fed, and the performer of the rite is to observe most carefully a life of outward and inward purity, and to fix his mind on Hari or Vishnú. Párvatí having with the aid of Sanatkumára, as directing priest, accomplished the ceremony on the banks of the Ganges, returns after some interval, in which she sees Kṛishná, first as a body of light, and afterwards as an old Bráhmaña, come to her dwelling. The reward of her religious zeal being delayed, she is plunged in grief, when a viewless voice tells her to go to her apartment where she will find a son, who is the lord of Goloka, or Kṛishná, that deity having assumed the semblance of her son, in recompence of her devotions.

In compliment to this occasion, all the gods came to congratulate Śiva and Párvati, and were severally admitted to see the infant: amidst the splendid cohort was Śani, the planet Saturn, who, although anxious to pay his homage to the child, kept his eyes steadfastly fixed on the ground. Párvatí asking him the cause of this, he told her, that being immersed in meditation upon Vishnú, he had disregarded the caresses of his wife, and in resentment of his neglect she had denounced upon him the curse that whomever he gazed upon he should destroy: to obviate the evil consequences of this imprecation he avoided looking any one in the face. Párvatí having heard his story paid no regard to it, but considering, that what must be, must be, gave him permission to look at her son. Śani calling Dharma to witness his having leave, took a peep at Gaṇeśa, on which the child's head was severed from the body, and flew away to the heaven of Kṛishṇa, where it reunited with the substance of him, of whom it was part. Durgā, taking the headless trunk in her arms, cast herself weeping on the ground, and the gods thought it decent to imitate her example, all except Vishṇu, who mounted Garuḍa, and flew off to the river Pushpabhadra, where finding an elephant asleep he took off his head, and flying back with it, clapped it on the body of Gaṇeśa; hence the body of that deity is crowned with its present uncouth capital. On the restoration of Gaṇeśa to life, valuable gifts were made to the gods and brāhmaṇas by the parents, and by Pārvatī's father, the personified Himālaya. The unfortunate Śani was again anathematised, and in consequence of the curse of Pārvatī has limped ever since.

These legends and others of minor importance, with the various prayers and addresses of the deities, occupy the first 13 chapters. The next five give an account of the birth of Kārttikeya. In the 19th and 21st chapters the reason why Gaṇeśa's head was lopped off is given. Śiva offended with Āditya, the sun, slew him, and although he restored him to life, incurred the wrath of the sage Kaśyapa, who doomed his (Śiva's) son to lose his head. The elephant was Indra's elephant, and was decapitated because Indra threw over his neck the garland of flowers, which the sage Durvāsas gave him, and the disrespect of which, with the consequent degradation of Indra, is noticed in various Purāṇas, although in all other respects with different results. Indra was no loser of an elephant by his decapitation, as Vishṇu, moved by the prayers of his mate, gave him another head in place of that which he took away. The humiliation of Indra, and his recovery of Lakshmi or glory, are the subjects of the next five chapters, and the remaining half of this section is occupied with the story of Gaṇeśa's losing one of his tusks. It was broken off by Paraśurāma, and the occurrence therefore involves his history, and that of his ancestor Bhṛigu, the possessor of the all-bestowing cow by Jamadagni, the attempt to carry her off by the king Kārtavīryārjuna; the conflict that ensued, and the death of the sage; Paraśurāma's avenging his father's loss, by slaying Kārtavīryārjuna; his combats with the kings, who came to the aid of that prince; and the destruction of the military race.

After this last exploit, Paraśurāma, who was a favourite disciple of Śiva, went to Kailāsa to visit his master; on arriving at the inner apartments, his entrance was opposed by Gaṇeśa, as his father was asleep. Paraśurāma nevertheless urged his way, and after a long and absurd dialogue, in which devotion to Kṛishṇa is most abruptly and diffusely introduced, the parties came to blows. Gaṇeśa had at first the advantage, seizing Paraśurāma in his trunk, and giving him a twirl that left him sick and senseless; on recovering, Rāma threw his axe at Gaṇeśa, who recognizing it as his father's weapon (Śiva having given it to Paraśu-rāma) received it with all humility upon one of his tusks, which it immediately severed, and hence Gaṇeśa has but one tusk, and is known by the names Ekadanta and Ekadanshtra, (the single-tusked). Pārvatī was highly incensed with Paraśurāma, and was about to curse him, when Kṛishṇa, of whom he was the worshipper, appeared as a boy and appeased her indignation. This part of the work ends with a recapitulation of the names of Gaṇeśa, his quarrel with Tulasī, in consequence of an imprecation from whom it was that he lost one of his tusks; Paraśurāma's adoration of him, and retiring to lead an ascetic life.

The last section, the Kṛishṇa Janma Khaṇḍa, is very voluminous, containing 132 chapters. It gives an account of Kṛishṇa's birth and adventures, as narrated by Nārāyaṇa to Nārada.

The narrative is introduced by a panegyric of the individual, who is a real Vaishṇava, or thoroughly devoted to Kṛishṇa: and who consequently becomes endowed with all knowledge and virtue, acquires superhuman faculties on earth, is elevated to the region of Kṛishṇa after death, and liberates himself, and seven generations above and below him, from the penalty of regeneration. All crimes avoid him, or are consumed in his purity, like moths in a lamp; and any one meeting him on the road is thereby cleansed of the sins he may have contracted for seven preceding lives; no course of religious practices or devout penances is necessary to the attainment of such miraculous excellence, and the love of Hari or Kṛishṇa is the only condition required. He who has received the initiatory mantra, who repeats the name of that divinity constantly, who transfers to him every worldly desire and possession, whose thoughts ever dwell upon him in prosperity or distress, and the hair of whose body stands erect with rapture on his simply hearing any of the appellations of Kṛishṇa articulated, has fulfilled every obligation, and merits the designation of a Vaishṇava.

According to this Purāṇa, and this only, the original cause of Kṛishṇa's incarnation was his love of Rādhā. The Rādhā of the Goloka had been compelled to assume a mortal body by the imprecation of a Gopa of that region, Kṛīdama, the minister of his master's pleasures, and the object of Rādhā's anger. Him she condemned in a fit of jealous indignation to become the Asura Sankhāchūḍa, and he in retaliation sentenced her to become a nymph of Vṛindāvana. To console her in this condition Kṛishṇa also came down to this world, as her lover; at the same time, however, granting the prayers of Brahmā and the gods, who solicited his appearance to relieve the earth from the burthen of the iniquities under which she laboured, the legitimate purpose of every descent or Avatāra. In order to provide Kṛishṇa and Rādhā with suitable associates, all the gods and goddesses also assumed their respective characters as Gopas and Gopīs, or members of the family of Yadu, and the heroes of the Mahābhārata. Vasudeva, the father of Kṛishṇa, was an incarnation of Kaśyapa, and Devakī, his mother, of Aditi.

Nanda was an incarnation of one of the Vasus, and Yásodá of his spouse Dhará. Durgá was incarnate as the daughter of the bear Jámaván. Jámavatí, one of Kṛishná's brides, and Lakshmi, multiplied herself into the sixteen thousand princesses, whom Kṛishná enumerated amongst his wives.

The story of Vasudeva and Devakí, and the birth of Kṛishná are narrated in the usual manner, which gives occasion to directions for the celebration of the Janínáshthamí, or festival in commemoration of the birth-day of Kṛishná on the 8th lunation of the month Śrávaṇ, and the Purána authorises its observance agreeably to the practice of the Śáktas, which allows it to be independent of the moon's entering into the asterism Rohiṇí, although should the position of the moon and the lunation occur together, the festival is the more holy, and is termed Jayantí or triumphant. The festival is on no account to commence on that day, in which a part of the 7th lunation may occur. The variety of doctrine and observance on this head is explained in the Asiatic Researches (vol. xvi, page 92, note). To omit the observance altogether is a crime not to be expiated, and is equal in atrocity to the murder of a hundred brahmans.

The infant exploits of Kṛishná are next related, and require no particular comment. Garga, the Muni, points out Rádhá, the daughter of Vṛishabhánu, as an eligible bride for the youth, and acquaints Nanda, Kṛishná's foster-father, of the secret of her divinity, in which he thus expounds her name.

“The letter R preserves persons from sin, the vowel A obviates regeneration, Dh shortens the period of mortal existence, and the second long vowel sunders all worldly bonds.” The marriage was accordingly celebrated with great rejoicing, and the distribution of viands in large quantities, and the donation of immense treasures. The incompatibility of such profusion with the condition of Nanda, the cowherd, is of no consideration to the author of this work, although it has saved the author of the Bhāgavata, the original of the greater part of the story, from any such gross extravagancies.

The hero of the festivities steals the curds in the next chapter, for which he is tied to a tree, and gets a whipping from his foster-mother Yaśodā. After she leaves him, the tree falls, and from it emerges Nalakuvera, the son of Kuvera, condemned to this metamorphosis for indecent behaviour in the presence of Devala¹ Muni.

A long chapter is next occupied with the praises of Rādhā by Kṛishṇa and Brahmā, which inculcate her supremacy over all other divinities, male or female, and her being inseparable from and one with Kṛishṇa. The sports of the juvenile god are then related, and his destruction of the demons Vaka, Kesi, and Pralamba; the construction of palaces at Gokula, for all its inhabitants, by Viśwakarmā, the divine architect, of whose architectural exploits the village of Gokula now offers no vestiges. This part of the work comprises the history of Vṛishabhānu, and his wife Kalāvati, the parents of Rádhá, and who were rewarded by her birth for the virtues of their former existence, as Suchandra, a king of the family of Manu, and Kalāvati, a will-born daughter of the Pitṛis or progenitors of mankind. This story includes a dissertation upon the virtues of women.

Several chapters follow, partly describing the actions of Kṛishná, and partly expatiating upon his excellencies and those of Rádhá.

A legend of Sáhasika, the son of the son of Bali, follows, who was turned into an ass by the curse of Durvásas for having disturbed the meditation of that sage, in the prosecution of his amours with Tilottamá, a nymph of heaven. On the penitence of the couple, Durvásas announced to them, that the ass should be destroyed by the discus of Kṛishná, in consequence of which the spirit of Sáhasika should receive final emancipation, and that Tilottamá should be born the daughter of Bānásura, in which capacity she should become the bride of Aniruddha, the grandson of Kṛishná.

The marriage of Durvásas with Kadáli, the daughter of Aurva Muni, is the next legend; in this the violent temper of his wife excites the sage's wrath, and he reduces her to ashes. Repenting subsequently of his anger, and soothed by the appearance of Brahmá, he changes the remains of his wife into a plantain tree. The same sage is the subject of another legend of great celebrity amongst the Vaishnávas, as illustrating Kṛishṇa's superiority over Śiva. Durvāsas, a votary of that deity, being offended with Ambarīsha, a devout worshipper of Viṣṇu, attempted to destroy him, but was repelled, and narrowly escaped destruction himself by the Chakra or discus of Viṣṇu, which came to the assistance of the king. The merits of fasting on the eleventh day of the fortnight are the subject of the next chapter, and they are followed by an explanation of the eight names of Durgā, which again is relieved by a story of Kṛishṇa; carrying away and hiding the clothes of the nymphs of Gokula, whilst they were bathing in the Jamnā. He gives up his booty upon being prayed to by Rādhā, in the usual strain, eulogising his divine supremacy, and identification with all things known or unknown. Several legends of minor importance follow, to the 32nd chapter; when that, and the two following, are occupied with the advances made by Mohinī, a heavenly nymph, to Brahmā, and his insensibility, in resentment of which she curses him, that he shall not receive any adoration from mankind; the effects of which malediction are said to be evinced in the neglect which Brahmā experienced from the professors of the Hindu faith.

The attention of the work is next directed, through a series of chapters, to the legends of the Śaiva faith, or Brahmā's discomfiture by Śiva, the asceticism of the latter, his marriage with Satī, the daughter of Dakṣa, her burning herself, and Śiva's second marriage with Pārvatī, the daughter of Himālaya. Stories of Vṛishaspati, Indra, Vahni, Durvāsas, and Dhanwan-tari then follow. All these legends are supposed to be narrated by Kṛishṇa to Rādhā for her entertainment; and their general purport is to shew, that the personages to whom they refer are immeasurably inferior to Kṛishṇa and his votaries.

Some cases are then recorded of the humiliation of the leading personages of the Hindu Pantheon, in consequence of their incurring the displeasure of Kṛishṇa or some of his followers. Vishṇu, whilst boasting himself the god of all, was swallowed by Kṛishṇa in the form of a Bhairava, all but his head, and was restored to his form on recovering his senses; Brahmā, whilst making a similar vaunt, was surprised to behold multitudes of Brahmās and Brahmā́ndas, or creations distinct from himself and his works; and Śiva was condemned to pay the penalty of his pride by his marriage with Satí, and distraction for her loss, which were the delusions of Kṛishṇa.

The 62nd chapter contains a summary account of Rámachandra, and the next ten proceed with an account of the transactions that immediately preceded Kṛishṇa's departure from Vṛindávan for Mathurá, whither he was attracted, with his supposed father Nanda, by a special invitation from Kansa, his uncle, with a view to his destruction, at a sacrifice offered to Śiva. The result of this visit is the death of Kansa, as described in other Purāṇas; but there is no detail of the previous wrestling, which occurs in the Bhágavata*.

On taking final leave of his foster father Nanda, Kṛishṇa favours him with a code of regulations, for his moral and religious conduct: he is not to look at a single star, nor the setting sun or moon; not to keep company with the wicked, nor to injure or insult Bráhmaṇas, cows, and Vaishṇavas; not to delay payment of the due fees to the priest who officiates at a ceremony; not to eat flesh or fish; not to vilify Śiva, Durgá, or Gaṇapati; and on no account to omit every possible demonstration of his love for Hari. These injunctions extend to a great length, and are all of as little importance as the above. There are some curious denunciations, however, against acts which are lawful in the institutes of Manu; and no distinction is here made between a Brahman who follows the profession of arms, and one who marries a woman of the Śúdra caste. There is also a singular leaning shown to the Śaiva faith, and the man who forms a single Śiva-linga of clay is said to reside in heaven for 100 Kalpas. The following scale is given of Kṛishṇa's affections: "Of all tribes the Bráhmaṇa is most esteemed by me, Lakshmi is still more beloved than a Brahman, Rádhá is dearer to me than Lakshmi, a faithful worshipper is dearer than Rádhá, and Śankara is the best beloved of all." The instructions to Nanda comprise also a dissertation upon dreams, upon knowledge of the divine nature, and on the duties of the different castes and orders of the Hindus, on the duties of women, and the expiation of offences. This division of the work extends from the 75th to the 85th chapter.

A legend of the birth of Vṛindá, the daughter of Kedára, next follows: from her, Vṛindávana, or as usually termed Bindrában, derives its appellation, she being identified with Rádhá in her birth at that place. This chapter is followed by several others of a very miscellaneous character, in which Brahmá, Śiva, and the Munis eulogise Kṛishná's power. The next sections are occupied with the mission of Uddhava from Kṛishná to Gokula, to bear intelligence of the latter to his parents and his mistresses; and we have then a short detail of the usual Pauráṇik chronology: Uddhava returns to Kṛishná, and we have then a narrative of Kṛishná's being invested with the thread of his tribe; he then prosecutes his studies under Sandípani Muni, and at their close relinquishes the garb of a cowherd for the robes of a king, presenting to his Guru four lacs of diamonds, an equal number of other sorts of gems, five lacs of pearls, a necklace worn by Durgá, dresses worth all the treasures of the world, and ten crores of Suvarñas, or certain measures of gold:—puerile exaggerations, which, although not unknown to the other Puráṇas, are most lavishly multiplied in the work under review.

Although assuming a royal character, this work describes Kṛishná as resigning the supremacy to Ugrasena, and directing Dwáráká to be built for him by the divine architect Viśwasena—a wide departure from the account every where else given of the circumstances, under which Dwáráká became the capital of Kṛishná. He having been driven from Mathurá by Jarásandha, the father-in-law of Kansa, whom Kṛishṇa had deposed and slain, Kṛishṇa and his tribe, on their expulsion from Mathurá, fled to the west coast of the peninsula, and there founded a new city. No notice whatever is taken of these revolutions in this work, although they are told at some length in the Mahábhārata, Vishṇu Purāṇa, and Bhágavata *. In a subsequent chapter, indeed, this Purāṇa refers to the same events, although it does not particularise them, and Rukmī the brother of Rukmiṇī reproaches Kṛishṇa with having fled to Dwaraká through fear of Jarásandha.

Kṛishṇa's marriage with Rukmiṇī is next narrated, but he does not carry her off, as in other authorities, Her brother opposes his entrance into the city, but is defeated by Baladeva, and then Kṛishṇa enters, and is duly married to the princess in her father's presence. Every where else he runs away with her before the marriage, and Baladeva checks the pursuit.

In the next chapters a conversation between Kádhá and Yásodá expounds the purport of eleven names of Kṛishṇa, and these are succeeded by an account of the birth of Rukmiṇī's son Pradyumna, his being carried off by a demon, and his recovery, the birth of other sons of Kṛishṇa, and marriage of the sage Durvásas to a daughter of Ugrasena. Kṛishṇa's share in the war of the Mahábhārata is very briefly dispatched, except a long hymn to him by Śísupála, whom he slew. The intrigue of Aniruddha, Kṛishṇa's grandson, with Ushá, the daughter of Vána, is narrated at some length in the usual style, and the unsuccessful contest waged by that prince against Kṛishná is protracted by the episodical insertion of a variety of stale legends to a disproportionate extent; these stories are related alternately by Aniruddha and Vána, as they stand prepared to engage in single combat for the purpose of proclaiming the respective might of Kṛishná and Śiva, Vána being devoted to the worship of the latter divinity. Śiva however, after vainly attempting to dissuade him from the conflict, is obliged to witness his votary's defeat, with that of Skanda and Bhadrakālī, who had gone to his succour; and Vána becoming sensible of Kṛishná's supremacy consents to his daughter's union with Aniruddha.

* [Mahábh. II, c. 13 ff. Vishṇu Pur. V, 23. Bhág. Pur. I, 10.]

The next chapters relate to the origin of the Bindusára Tírtha from the tears of Kṛishná; the reason why it is sinful to look at the moon on the 4th day of Bhádra, and Satrájit's obtaining that gem, whose presence in a country insures its fertility. The adoration of Gaṇeśa by Rádhá, in the presence of the assembled deities, is the subject of the 122nd and 123rd chapters, and as acknowledged in the text, is one rarely treated of in other Purāṇas. Gaṇeśa, not to be outdone, eulogises Rádhá in his turn, and is followed by Brahmá and Ananta. The worship of Gaṇeśa by Rádhá marked the termination of the curse, which had sentenced her to a mortal existence; and she was then restored to her celestial nature, in which Durgá is made to declare that there is no difference between Rádhá and herself, and whoever speaks in a depreciating manner of either, is equally punished in hell.

Krishná, having also offered worship to Gaṇeśa, returns to Dwáraká, and resumes his lessons to Nanda and his family; he also prophesies the depravity of the world in the succeeding or Kali age, in which men will abstain from venerating Śálagráma stones and Tulasí plants, and attach themselves assiduously to the service of Mlechhas, barbarians and outcastes, who it is said also shall become the rulers of the country:—expressions indicative of the prevalence of the Mohammedan authority, when the Purāṇa was compiled.

Rádhá after this returns to Goloka, with all the Gopas and Gopís of divine origin, Krishná creating others to supply their place at Vríndávan. The circumstances of Krishná's death, by a wound from a hunter, the destruction of his tribe, and the submersion of Dwáraká by the sea, are next alluded to in so brief and obscure a manner, that without a previous knowledge of what is intended the notice would be quite unintelligible; and these events are lost sight of amidst the much more detailed addresses of the gods and goddesses, the ocean, the rivers, and particularly the Ganges, in which the sufferings of the earth, in consequence of Krishná's departure, are most pathetically lamented. After Krishná's death the form that proceeded from his person went to the Śweta Dwípa, where it became two: one-half was Nárayaṇa, the lord of Vaikuṇtha; the other was Krishná, the deity of Goloka, the supreme indescribable source of all, who ascended to his original seat, and was reunited to Rádhá.

The Purāṇa properly closes here, at the end of the 128th chapter; but Nárada, who has been its auditor, now hears from the narrator Náráyāṇa that he, Nárada, was in his former life a Gandharva, the husband of 50 wives, one of whom is reborn, as well as himself, and by the boon of Śiva is to be once more his bride. Nárada submits rather reluctantly, and shortly after his marriage with the daughter of Śrínjaya, who is declared to be one with Máya, runs away from his wife to perform penance, through which he is united with Hari.

A supplementary chapter, the 130th, follows, in which Sūta, the ordinary narrator or recapitulator of the Purāṇas, relates two legends, explaining the birth of Fire from Brahmá, and of gold from Fire. Chapter 131 is a short index to the Purāṇas. The last chapter, 132, enumerates the different Parāṇas and Upapurāṇas, the five works called Páñcharátra, and the five Sanhitás or compendia of the Vaishnáva faith. It is also remarkable for its definition of the Mahábhárata, and the Rámáyāṇa, the former of which it terms an Itihása, or history, and the latter a Kávyā, or poem: the work terminates with a eulogium on itself; the attentively hearing of one quarter of a verse of which is equal in merit to the gift of the heaven of Krishná.

The preceding sketch of the contents and character of this work will probably have furnished sufficient evidence of its modern origin. It is clearly subsequent to the great body of Hindu literature, not only by the enumeration just noticed, but by reference to the several philosophical systems, the Tarka, Vaiśeshika, Sāṅkhya, Pātanjala, Mīmāṃsā, and Vedānta, which occurs in a preceding passage. Its being the latest of the Purāṇas is also apparent from its own avowal of its being intended to clear up the discrepancies observable in those works, and by the frequent assertion, that the legends it gives, particularly those respecting Gaṇeśa, are not to be met with in the other Purāṇas. That it was compiled subsequent to the Mohammedan invasion, is very probable from the allusions it contains to the supremacy of Mlechha rulers; and the particular branch of the Hindu system which it advocates renders it likely to have emanated from a sect, which there is reason to imagine originated about four centuries ago with Vallabhāchārya and the Gosāins of Gokula.

V. VISHŪ PURĀŅA.

THE Vishṇu Purāṇa, as may be inferred from its appellation, is eminently Vaishṇava, and considers Vishṇu one with the Supreme Being, Parama Brahma, and Paramātmā.

It is supposed to be related by Parāśara, the grandson of Vaśishṭha, to his disciple Maitreya, and dispenses with the usual machinery of Sūta and the Īshis; it is said in the first chapter, indeed, in the form of a prophetic enunciation by Vaśishtha, that Parāśara is the author of the Sanhitā and the Purāṇas.

In other chapters, however, it is again asserted that Dwaipāyana Vyāsa is the author of all the Purāṇas, and to reconcile these two statements recourse is had to a statement in the 3rd chapter of the 3rd section. It is said, that there is a Vyāsa or Veda Vyāsa in every Dwāpara Yuga of the Vaivaswata Manwantara; of this Manwantara we are now in the 28th Kali: accordingly, 28 Dwāpara Yugas have elapsed, and 28 Veda Vyāsas have existed; the last is Kṛishṇa Dwai-pāyana, or the person usually designated as Vyāsa. Parāśara was the 26th Vyāsa, and this Purāṇa is consequently the work of a preceding Mahāyuga, or aggregate of four ages. The Agni Purāṇa states Parāśara to be the author of the Vishṇu Purāṇa. In the classification adopted by itself, (book 3rd, chapter 6,) it is placed the third, after the Brāhma and Pādma.

This Purāṇa is divided into six Anśas, books or sections, each being sub-divided into a varying number of Adhyāyas or chapters: it does not follow the order prescribed by the usual definition of a Purāṇa, but deviates less widely than most of these compositions: according to the Agni Purāṇa it contains 25,000 ślokas. A commentary on this Purāṇa exists, but of no great value, except as explanatory of some of the philosophical passages*.

* [More fully described in the Preface to the Vishṇu Pur., p. LXXIV.]

The first book opens with the dialogue between Maitreya and Parásara, as already noticed. Parásara states himself to be the son of Śakti, the son of Vaśishṭha. Buchanan, from the Bhágavata, makes him the son of Upamanyu and grandson of Śakti, but the Mahábhá-rata* confirms the authority of the Purāṇa. "The son of Śakti (Parásara) next arrived there with his disciples." The passage of the Bhágavata on which Buchanan's statement rests, has not been found; the Bengali manuscripts generally read Śaktri instead of Śakti.

Buchanan has also noticed the incompatibility of Parásara's genealogy with his being, as it is stated, cotemporary with Śántanu king of Hástinapur, that prince being the 44th in descent from Atri, who is cotemporary with Vaśishṭha, who again is but three generations anterior to Parásara; he supposes, therefore, that many generations in the line of Vaśishṭha must have been omitted. It is not necessary, however, to attempt to reconcile these incongruities, for the cotaneous existence of Atri and Vaśishṭha is less chronological than mythological, or, perhaps, as they are both enumerated amongst the stars of the great bear, astronomical; it extends throughout the Manwantara; their immediate successors, who hold a sacred character, enjoy a like longevity, and are similarly cotemporary at any period with their ancestry and posterity; if we consider them as mere mortals, we must suppose that Parásara preceded the great war by three generations, Kṛishṇa Dwaipáyana, his son, being the father of Dhṛitaráshtra, Paṇḍu and Vidura by the widow of Vichitravírya. Vyása was however cotemporary with his grandson and their descendants, agreeably to the above system of saintly immortality. Mr. Bentley places Parásara about 575 B. C. (Hindú astronomy), Buchanan about 1300 B. C. (Genealogies of the Hindús), and Wilford 1391 (A. R. IX. 87).

The first chapters of the first book of the Vishnú Purána contain an account of the creation, ascribing it to the association of Vishnú with Pradhána and Purusha, matter and spirit, or the female and male, or passive and active energies. During the intervals of creation, Vishnú exists independant of all connexion or attributes, and is beyond the comprehension of human faculties. When disposed to create the universe, the elements, properties, and senses generated by the two sensible combinations of the deity are collected into an egg floating on the water, in which Vishnú again, as Brahmá, is concealed, and from which he issues to separate, and arrange the constituent portions of the world: the system is therefore perfectly conformable to that anciently entertained as explained in the opening of Manu, substituting Vishnú for Brahmá.

The third chapter contains the usual divisions of time, from the twinkling of an eye to the period of a Kalpa; the fourth, an account of the Varáha Avatára, whence the Varáha Kalpa, or actual great period, derives its appellation. In the 5th chapter we have the series of creations effected by Vishnú, amounting to nine, followed by a more detailed account of the order in which the several classes of beings sprang into existence, extending through the 6th and 7th chapters.

The seventh chapter brings us to the creation of the chief characters of the Swáyambhuva Manwantara, the account of whose family is in part at least obviously an allegory. Swáyambhuva, the son of the self-existent, is married to Śatarúpá, (the hundred or many-formed, the great mother;) their children are two sons, Priyavrata (the lover of devotion), and Uttānapáda (where we are at fault), and two daughters, Prasúti (child-bearing) and Ákúti*, a name not admitting an obvious allegorical etymology. It may be observed, that the Bhāgavata adds a third daughter, Devahúti (invocation of the gods), married to Kardama (soil or sin); Ákúti was married to Ruchi (light), a Prajāpati, but not included in the usual enumeration of those sons of Brahmá, unless he be the same with Maríchi; their offspring were Yajna (sacrifice), and Dakshiṇá (donation), who, though brother and sister, were married and begot the twelve divinities called Yámas, a class whose character and office are not known. Prasúti was married to the Prajāpati Daksha (ability or power); they had twenty-four daughters, all emblematical, Śraddhá, (faith,) Lakshmí, (prosperity,) Dhṛiti, (fortitude,) Tushtí, (content,) Pushtí, (satiety,) Medhá, (apprehension,) Kriyá, (action,) &c.; thirteen were married to Dharma, (equity;) of the other eleven nine were married to the nine Rishis, Swáhá (oblation) was wedded to fire, and the collective Pitris or progenitors had Śráddha, the funeral sacrifice, for their spouse: their posterity are all of the same significant character, as their appellations satisfactorily indicate. The Puráñas, in general, follow this account of the first race of created beings with some modifications and additions: the Bhágavata, as we shall hereafter see, has supplied the most copious accessions, and has introduced into the series a degree of perplexity and inconsistency that are quite foreign to the simplicity of the Vishnú Puráña, in which we may therefore conceive the primitive notion is most faithfully represented.

The churning of the ocean for the recovery of Śrí and Amṛita or ambrosia, lost to the gods in consequence of the anger of Durvásas with Indra, is narrated in the ninth chapter, but more concisely than usual. The posterity of the Rishis by the daughters of Daksha follow, and we have then a long episode relating to Dhruva, the second son of Uttánapáda, who for his devotion to Vishnú was elevated to the dignity of the polar star.

The descendants of Dhruva are traced in the 13th chapter to the 6th Manu Chákshusha, and from him by Uru, Anga, and Veña to Prithu, from whom the earth was named Prithiví: the fourth descent from Prithu consisted of the ten Práchetasas, and their son was Daksha the Prajapati in a new birth: this is the father of the 60 daughters, of whom 27 were the constellations, the lunar mansions, or wives of the moon, and thirteen the wives of Kaśyapa, by whom the gods and demons, men and animals, were produced. The remaining chapters of this section contain the accounts in detail of the origin of these races, from the daughters of Daksha married to Kaśyapa. The original refers these in the 21st chapter to the Swárochisha Manwantara, but this is irreconcilable with the descent of Daksha, as before mentioned, from Chákshusha Manu, and as again stated in the third book. This section of the Purāṇa terminates with the division of the universe under its respective regents, and praises of Vishṇu as the Supreme Being.

The second book contains the usual account of the division of the earth into Dwīpas, and the formation of the seven Pátálas, and Naraka, with the situation and course of the planets and the description of their several cars: that of the sun is very fully and curiously detailed:—the last chapters give a legendary account of Bharata, the object of which is to inculcate the supremacy of Vishṇu, and the unreality of worldly existence, agreeably to the doctrines of the Vedānta philosophy.

The third book of the Vishṇu Purāṇa should have formed, agreeably to the systematic classification of the contents of a Purāṇa, its fourth, treating of the reigns of the different Manus and their descendants: the detail however is little more than a bare enumeration of names, the appellation of the Manu, the Indra, or king of the gods, the Gaṇas or classes of Devas, the seven Ṛishis, and the sons of the Manu, and who are all distinct in each Manwantara. Those of the first, sixth, and seventh periods are of the most note. In the intermediate ones little of interest occurs, and less in those that are to come. We may therefore here insert the names of the persons of these three Manwantaras.

In this manner the persons of the remaining seven Manwantaras are prophetically detailed.

In the next chapter of the third section occurs the enumeration of the 28 Veda Vyásas already alluded to. In the Dwápara age of every Maháyuga, or aggregate of four Yugas, a Muni or sage appears, who makes a new arrangement of these works, and is therefore called Vyása or Veda Vyása. The Vyása of the present period is Kṛishṇa Dwaipáyana, the son of Parásara, and the twenty-eighth of the series, and who, according to this authority, and the sectarial notions it advocates, is a minor descent or incarnation of Vishṇu himself.

The origin of the Vedas and Purāṇas is treated of in the next chapter of this section, with many curious details. The Veda, it is said, was originally a ritual, containing ample instructions for the five great sacrifices, or oblations to fire, at the full and change of the moon, and in every fourth month the offering of animals, and libation with the juice of the acid Asclepias; these five being doubled as Prakṛiti and Vikṛiti, or simple and modified, became ten, and these were the objects of the Vedas.

The mode in which Vyása is described as arranging the Veda implies its prior existence in separate portions, as he called to his assistance four persons severally acquainted with them, or Paila for the Rik, Vaiśampáyana for the Yajur, Jaimini for the Sáma, and Sumanta for the Atharvan. The description is not very clear, but it should seem that he made a kind of digest of the whole collectively, which he again separated according to the purport of the different passages; the Řik, containing the Řichas, or prayers used with oblations by the Hotří, or officiating priest; the Yajur, comprising the formulæ of the rite repeated by the Adhwaryu; the Sáma, composed of the hymns chanted by the Udgátá; and the Atharvan comprehending prayers and rites suitable for princes or the military order, repeated or conducted by the Brahmans on their behalf.

The Vishnú Purána then describes the different Sanhitás, or collections of the prayers and formulæ of each Veda, and their respective authors. The Řig was divided into two Sanhitás by Paila, who taught one to Indrapramati and the other to Váshkala, each of these and their disciples made further subdivisions. The Yajur was divided into 27 Śákhás by Vaiśampáyana, besides the other great portion of it obtained from the sun, by Vájnavalkya, which subsequently branched into fifteen divisions. The Sáma and Atharvan are in a like manner extensively subdivided. The whole of these details are curious, and indicate a period long forgotten, when the Vedas were extensively studied: the names derived from the subdivisions, as Taittirí, Vájí, &c. still designate tribes of Brahmans in some parts of India, but few of any of the separate Sanhitás are procurable. Mr. Colebrooke has made use of these sections of the Vishnú Purána in his account of the Vedas. (A. R. Vol. VIII.)

The origin of the Puránas is here also ascribed indirectly to various individuals. Vyása is said to have compiled the Purāña Sanhitá, but he gave it to Síta or Lomaharshaña, who had six disciples, Sumati, Agni-varçchchá, Maitreya, Śansápáyana, Kaśyapa, and Sá-varñi; and to them Síta delivered six Sanhitás. Three of the disciples, Śansápáyana, Kaśyapa, and Sávarñi, composed Sanhitás, also called Múla Sanhitá, and Romaharshaña compiled another. The Vishnú Purāña, again, it may be inferred, is a subsequent compilation, at it is said to contain the substance of these four works. A list of the Purāñas is then given as usual, omitting the Váyu from the series.

The remainder of the section is occupied with the detail of the duties of the different tribes and orders, and terminates with an absurd legend called the Yama Gítá, the scope of which is to shew that the spirits of those who have faith in Vishnú are not to be approached by the messengers of the infernal monarch; it must be admitted, however, that compared with the other Purāñas the Vishnú Purāña does not very frequently offend with legendary insipidities of this description.

The fourth section contains the genealogies of the royal families, commencing with the lines of the sun and moon, and terminating with the kings of the Kali age, until a modern period. This section has furnished the greater part of the materials with which Sir William Jones, Mr. Bentley, and Colonel Wilford, attempted to adjust the historical chronology of the Hindus; the latter (A. R. Vol. IX.) gives the Vishnú Purāña as one of his authorities; the first cites a list furnished by his Pandit, but it is the same thing with one or two inaccuracies; as an example of these may be stated what he asserts of the four Káñwa princes, that they reigned 345 years, whence Sir William Jones observes, that the generations of men and reigns of kings are extended beyond the course of nature even in the present age. (A. R. II, 143.)

Adverting to the same circumstance, Mr. Bentley refers (vol. V, page 324,) the extravagant elongation of the reigns of these princes to a deliberate attempt to fill up a chasm occasioned by placing the descendants of Janamejaya at too early a period, and cites this as one of the innumerable absurdities of the modern Hindus.

Colonel Wilford again observes, these Káñwas are said to have reigned 345 years, which is still more extravagant. (Vol. IX, page 110.)

It would scarcely be supposed, that these assertions are all founded on error. In the early stage of Sir William Jones's enquiries, his trusting to his Pandit's authority may be excused; but it seems very doubtful whether Mr. Bentley or Colonel Wilford took the pains to verify that statement. At any rate, in four manuscripts of the Vishnú Purāṇa, two in the Devanagari and two in the Bengali character, instead of 345 years, the term of the united reigns of the four Káñwa princes is stated to be 45 years, a period neither extravagant nor absurd, nor beyond the course of nature.

The ancient dynasties of kings anterior to the Kali age, within the bounds of which they should no doubt be brought, can scarcely be adjusted with much consistency or satisfaction; at the same time this is a consideration rather favourable to their authenticity, as had they been the result of a systematic fabrication, they would easily have been adapted to some fixed periods, and to each other. That many inaccuracies and some falsifications have crept into these genealogies may be readily admitted; but there is no good reason to dispute the actual existence of the principal individuals commemorated, nor the general course of their ancestry or descendants. That their memory was preserved by some means anterior to the Purāṇas is established by the Vishṇu Purāṇa. Reference is made in it repeatedly to former traditions, and old verses are cited as illustrative of the history or character of a number of the princes of whom mention is made. (Sections 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 19, &c.)

The 11th and following chapters of this book, to the 15th, contain a detailed account of the descendants of Yadu. A curious story is interwoven into the portion that relates to Kṛishṇa, of his being falsely accused of having stolen a marvellous gem, the possession of which secured wealth and prosperity to its possessor, if virtuous. It was given to Satrājīṭ, the cotemporary, very inconsistently it must be confessed, of Kṛishṇa, and his sixth ancestor, and a member of the Yādava family. Apprehending Kṛishṇa's requiring the gem, Satrājīṭ gave it to his brother, who was killed in the forest by a lion. Kṛishná hunting killed the lion and found the jewel; he returned it to Satrájit, who gave him in requital his daughter in marriage: this led to further family dissensions, in which Kṛishná was accused by his own brother of having underhandedly appropriated the gem to himself: he at last, however, cleared himself in an assembly of the Yádavas, and the jewel became the undisputed property of his relative Akrúra. In these transactions the character of Kṛishná, although heightened with marvels, is of a very earthly complexion; and as to Balaráma, it is said of him by Kṛishná that he is unfit to be master of the jewel, because he drinks wine, and is addicted to sensual pleasures. With respect to the gem, its properties of procuring plenty to the country of its possessor, and of bringing down rain when needed, ally it to the marvellous stone, for the acquisition of which the Tartar tribes not unfrequently had recourse to hostilities.

In detailing the lists of Mágadha kings the Vishnú Purána states, that from the birth of Paríkshit to the coronation of Nanda 1015 years elapsed. Nanda preceded Chandragupta 100 years, and Chandragupta, as identified with Sandrakoptus, ascended the throne 315 B. C. Paríkshit was the grandson of Arjuna, consequently the war of the Mahábhárata occurred 1430 years before the Christian era. Wilford reduces this by 60 years, and places the conclusion of the great war 1370 B. C.: the difference is not very material, and either date may present an approximation to the truth.

From Chandragupta to the accession of the Andhra princes three dynasties occupy an interval of 294 years: the Andhras therefore commenced their rule about 20 years before Christ, which will agree well enough with the account of the power of the Andræ, as given by Pliny, about the end of the first century of our era. According to the Purāṇa, there were 30 princes, who reigned 456 years, which brings them to A. D. 436. Colonel Wilford has endeavoured to extend them, however, to the seventh century, identifying the last or Pulomarchi with the Pouloumîen of the Chinese Annals, who died in 648, according to De Guignes. (As. Res. IX, 87.) If this is correct, the Andhra dynasty must be imperfectly given. The commencement being corroborated by Pliny is apparently accurate, but we want two centuries at the termination. Wilford proposes to supply part of the deficiency, which is less in his statement, by inserting seven princes, whom he calls genuine Andhras, before the Andhrabhṛityas; but there is no warrant for this, and the number is inadequate to the interval required. There is however evident confusion here in our authority, the text and comment state expressly that the dynasty is composed of 30 princes, and yet even with the repetition of the name Śātakarṇi five times, although it is probably intended in most cases as a title, we have but 27 names. Wilford's list, indeed, contains but 25 names. It is likely, therefore, that some of the names have been lost; and if we can suppose the dynasty to have comprised nearer 40 than 30 princes, we may extend the time of Pulimán, so as to be the same with that of Pouloumien.

There is another identification in this list with the Chinese history, which may be even more readily adjusted than the preceding. The annals of China record that in 408 ambassadors arrived from Yuegnai, king of Kiapilí in India, the Kapila of the Bauddhas, to which possibly the authority of the Mágadha prince as Lord paramount extended. The name of the prince is clearly Yajna, and we have a Yajna Śrí the 24th of the Andhra kings. Agreeably to the commencement of the race 20 years B. C. and the average of reigns authorised by the text, 15 years and five months, Yajna Śrí reigned about 330, or only 78 years earlier than he appears in the Chinese accounts. If indeed, as is allowable, we consider him to be the 27th prince, being the third before the last, then the agreement is almost precise; as he will have reigned from 375 to 390, and we have only to suppose his reign one of those above the average amount, to bring him to the year 408; these identifications, however, whether made out precisely or not, bear favourable testimony to the accuracy of the Hindu lists, as to the existence of the individuals about the time specified: we can scarcely expect a close concurrence in the annals of different nations, at best imperfectly known to each other*.

* [See Lassen, Ind. Alt. II, 755 f. 933 ff. Beil. II, p. XI ff. and Vishnu Pur. p. 472 ff.]

The succession of races which follows the Andhras, is evidently confused and imperfect; seven distinct dynasties are detailed, extending through 1390 years, and two others through a period of 406 years: 47 princes of different tribes succeed them, to whom less than four centuries cannot be ascribed, the whole throwing the last of the Andhras back 2190 years, and computing that 4055 years of the Kali age had elapsed: the last periods, grafted probably, as Colonel Wilford has supposed, on the coetaneous existence of different dynasties at undefined intervals, are in all likelihood calculated to fill up the years expired of the Kali age, and so furnish a clue to the date of this Purāṇa: if 4055 years of Kali had passed when the work was compiled, it was written 870 years ago, or in the year 954.

The notices that follow would present an interesting picture of the political distribution of India at the date at which it may be supposed the author wrote, if the passages were less obscure; at it is, considerable uncertainty pervades the description. It appears from it that the Kshatriya rule was very generally abolished, and that individuals of various castes, from Brahmans to Pulindas (mountaineers or foresters) reigned in Magadha or Behar, at Allahabad, at Mathurá, Kántipurí, Kásípurí or Kañyápurí, probably Benares or Kanouj, and in Anugangam or Gangetic Hindoostan. The Guptas, a term indicating a Súdra family, reigned over part of Magadha, and Deva-rakshita, an individual so named, over the maritime provinces of Kalinga, &c. the Guhas in another part of Kalinga, the Mañidhanus in the Naimisha, Nishada, and Kálatoya countries, or the districts to the east of Benares and Bengal. Súdras and cowherds ruled in Surat, in Mewár, along the Narmadá and at Ougein; and Mlechchhas possessed the country along the Indus, along the Chandrabhága, or in the Panjáb, Dárvika, and Kashmír*: this last statement is corroborative of the accuracy of the detail, as well as of the date assigned to the composition, as although in the middle of the tenth century, the Ghaznvide princes had not occupied Kashmír, yet they had extended their influence along the Indus, and into the upper parts of the Panjáb.

The fifth book is appropriated to the history of Kṛishná, and is possibly a graft of more recent date than the original. Although the story is told in the usual strain, yet there is this peculiarity, that Kṛishná is never considered as one and the same with Hari; he is only an Anśávatára or an incarnate portion of Vishnú; not a very distinguished one either, being only one of Vishnú's hairs (B. v. chapter 1.) plucked off by himself at the prayers of the gods, to become incarnate in the conception of Devakí, to be born for the purpose of alleviating the distresses of the earth.

The subsequent occurrences are related conformably to the tenor of the Bhágavata, and very differently, therefore, from that of the Bhárata; the war with Ja-

rásandha particularly, and the adventures of Kála Yavana: it also includes what may be supposed to typify some hostile struggles between the followers of Śiva and Viśhnú, in the personal conflict between Kṛishṇa, and the former, as taking part respectively with Aniruddha and Bānāsura.

From the 34th chapter of this section, we learn that there have been spurious Kṛishṇas amongst the Hindus, and Pauṇḍraka, the king of Benares, is described as usurping the title of Vāsudeva: he is encountered by the legitimate possessor of the name, defeated and slain: his son continues the war with the aid of Śankara or the Śaivas, and it should appear at first with some success, so as to endanger Dwaraká, the capital of Kṛishṇa: the allies however are repelled, and the holy city Káśi burnt by the relentless discus of the victor; the legend seems to delineate, though darkly, actual occurrences.

This book terminates with the destruction of the Yádavas; Kṛishṇa's being shot through mistake by a forester, and his ascent to heaven.

The last book of the Viśhnú Purāṇa, after describing the divisions of time into Kalpas, &c. expatiates on the various pangs that flesh is heir to, and directs mankind to the only remedy for them, faith in Viśhnú as the Supreme.

The general character of the Viśhnú Purāṇa will be readily conceived from this sketch of its contents: it is a sectarian work, but of a much more sober character than such works generally possess, and appropriates to legend and panegyric a comparatively insignificant portion of its contents: the geographical and astronomical systems to be found in it, are of the usually absurd complexion, but they are more succinctly and perspicuously described than perhaps in any other Purāṇas: the same may be said of the genealogies, and the fourth book may be regarded as a valuable epitome of the ancient history of the Hindus.

The date of the compilation, it has already been observed, may be inferred to be as low as the middle of the tenth century: there are no other grounds for specifying the date, but the Purāṇa is clearly subsequent to the development of the whole body of Hindu literature: the Vedas and their divisions are particularised, the names of all the Purāṇas are given as usual, and reference is repeatedly made to the Itihāsa and Dharma Śāstras. In the fourth section of the third book also Parāśara says: Who but Nārāyaṇa can be the author of the Mahābhārata? It is consequently posterior to that work, in common it is most probable with all the Purāṇas. Notwithstanding this recent origin, however, the Vishṇu Purāṇa is a valuable compilation, particularly in its being obviously and avowedly derived from more ancient materials.

VI. VĀYU PURĀÑA.

THE Vāyu Purāña is so named from having been originally, it is said, communicated by Vāyu, or the deity of the wind, to the assembled sages. It afterwards descended to Kṛishṇa Dwaipáyana Vyása, by whom it was taught to his disciple Lomaharshaṇa, and at his desire it is repeated by his son Ugraśravas to the holy ascetics at Naimisháraṇya, agreeably to the form in which these works usually commence.

At starting, however, a peculiarity occurs: the right of Sūta to the possession of the Vedas is denied, and he admits that he is entitled to teach only the Itihásas and Purāñas. This distinction is attributed to his equivocal origin which is very obscurely assigned to an error at a sacrifice held by Prithu, in which the Ghí appropriated to Vṛihaspati, the teacher, was confounded with that set apart for Indra, the disciple, and from the oblation, termed Sútyá, Sūta was produced. He consequently held an intermediate station between the Brahman and Kshatriya, whom these gods, it may be inferred, severally represent; and whilst in one capacity he is a scholar of Vyása and a teacher of the secondary scriptures, he is excluded in the other from instructing in the Vedas, and restricted to such means of acquiring a livelihood as are compatible with the military profession.

The origin of Súta as well as of Mágadha at the sacrifice of Prithu is also related in the Vishnú Purána*; they are there said to have sprung from the juice of the acid Asclepias, offered on that occasion. The same story opens the Śrīshī Khaṇḍa of the Pádma Purána, and is there more fully, if not more intelligibly detailed: the account being in fact the same as that of the Váyu Purána, and in the very same words, with the addition of some stanzas, and the partial alteration of others. The legend of the Váyu Purána is quoted in the commentary of Nílakaṇṭha on the Mahábhárata.

The mixed character of the Súta is, however, more rationally explained in the works of Law. He is the son of a Kshatriya father and Bráhmaṇí mother, and is consequently one of the Varña Sankara, or mixed castes. His occupations are properly of a martial character, as driving chariots and tending horses and elephants†, but as partaking of the Brahmanical order, he is also the encomiast, the herald or bard of chieftains and princes; such duty being assigned to him and the Mágadha, by Prithu, the son of Veña, and it is in this latter capacity that the Súta is the appropriate narrator of the Puráñas††.

The origin of the Sūta, whether legendary or rational, the duties which are assigned to him, and the right conceded to him of teaching the Purāṇas, seem to throw some light on the early history of these works. In all probability, they were at first the traditionary tales of a race of family poets, who corresponded precisely in character with the scalds and bards of the north, and were at once the eulogists of the chief and chroniclers of the family. In this manner some historical traditions were preserved before they were formed into any systematic account, but of course imperfectly and rudely. With the genealogies the poets blended, no doubt, fanciful and mythological fictions, and these were the materials which later writers wove into a connected form, and from which they constructed the primitive Purāṇas. The character of the compilers, that of religious men, gave however a new complexion to the competition, and the mythological and marvellous portions came to usurp an undue importance, to the neglect of the historical records. The genealogies were, however, probably preserved with some more care, as they were connected with the worship of certain deities or deified princes, particularly Rāma and Kṛishṇa. To the mythology also systems of cosmogony, geography, and astronomy were added, and the five divisions of the Purāṇas were then complete. They were not long however suffered to continue in this condition. Contending sects arose, and each, desirous of enlisting the Purāṇas on his side, foisted into them absurd and tasteless fictions, or metaphysical subtleties calculated to inculcate the worship of some individual manifestation of the Supreme. This began, there is reason to think, about the 7th and 8th centuries with the Yogīs. The followers of Śaiva doctrines carried it to a great extent between the 8th and 10th centuries, and in the 11th and 12th, or after the date of Rāmānuja and Madhwāchārya the Vaishṇava Purāṇas were, there is little doubt, re-made or remodelled to a very considerable extent. By all classes, however, the historical traditions of the Sūtas, or bards, were treated with neglect. They disappeared altogether from most of the Purāṇas, and were in all much mutilated and compressed. Such fragments as remain are, however, probably genuine, and when separated from what is marvellous and unnatural, furnish some insight into the actual history of India in periods remotely past.

To return from this digression, however, to the Vāyu Purāṇa, it may be observed, that as far as can be judged from the portion analysed, it is a work perhaps of the earliest date, amongst the existing Purāṇas, and clearly emanates from the Yoga school; it inculcates upon the whole the preferable worship of the forms of Śiva, but its sectarial bias is less violently displayed than is usual in these works, the legends are fewer, the cosmological parts are much more detailed, and there is altogether a copiousness and consistency of system which is not common in the Purāṇas. It is impossible in going through this work not to feel an air of originality and antiquity about it, which is not perceptible in any of the others hitherto examined. As far as appears to be the case also, from the translated chapters, there is no allusion to works or systems of an indisputably modern date.

The opening chapters profess to give a summary of the contents of the work, but upon the first glance the detail is far from being applicable to the sections that follow, either in subject or arrangement; on a further examination, however, it appears that the summary is more than once repeated, with different degrees of precision, and without any sufficient mark of distinction between the end of one series and the beginning of another: this want of method is not unfrequent in Hindu works, and the first books of the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa furnish specimens of the same defective mode of indexing. There appear to be three indexes in the first chapters of the Vāyu Purāṇa, of which the two first are partial and inappropriate; the third is more regular and entire, and corresponds with tolerable accuracy with the contents of the Purāṇa, as far as they extend in our copy, or to the description of the Manwantaras. The index then proceeds to the families of the sages and kings, observing apparently very little order in the details, but comprising some curious particulars: as in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, the account is carried forward into futurity, and the kings of the present age are noticed. These historical sections are followed by cosmology, terminating with the destruction of the world at the end of a Kalpa; the Purāṇa then gives the history of Vyāsa, and of the divisions of the Vedas; it comprises the legendary origin of Naimisháraṇya, and the occasion of the assemblage of the Rishis at that place, and concludes with an account of the incarnations of Śiva, which, if we may judge from the way in which that subject is treated in the Kúrma Purána*, is the succession of teachers of the Yoga doctrines. All these chapters are wanting in the only copy of the Váyu Purána we have been yet able to meet with. They should form the latter half of the Purána.

In the fourth chapter, the deity who existed before creation is represented as eternal, without beginning or end, and the origin of all things, comprehending within himself the two substances or attributes by whose joint operation perceptible objects were formed, or Átmá, Spirit, and Pradhána or Prakṛiti, Matter: the mode in which elementary or primitive creation was evolved from the action of these two is then described in technical language, conformable to the Sánkhyā cosmogony. The seven principal elements are the Mahátattwa, Ahankára, Ákáśa, Váyu, Tejas, Ap, and Pṛithiví. The first may perhaps be termed the principle of collective animated elementary existence, and the second the principle of individual animated elementary existence, although it must be confessed, that no very distinct and definite idea appears to be any where attached to them; they may be sometimes distinguished as mind, generally and individually, or elementary intellect free from passion or emotion in the first case, and joined with it in the second. The Mahátattwa again might occasionally be rendered the Divine Spirit connected with substance, but exempt from passion, and which upon addition of the Guñas, or qualities, becomes Ahankára: the difficulty of explaining these terms satisfactorily is however inseparable from the visionary character of the existence of the things which they denominate. The other five elements, if not more intelligible, are at least more familiar to us, and though as little susceptible of definition are, with one exception, cognisable by our senses, and therefore suggest positive notions. Ákáśa is ether, a subtle element thinner than air. The other four are air, fire, water, and earth. These partially combined into an egg which lay in water, the water was invested by fire, the fire by air, the air by Ákáśa, the Ákáśa by Ahankára, the Ahankára by the Mahátattwa, and the whole by the Avyakta or imperceptible, identified with Prakṛiti or Nature; from the egg, Hirañyagarbha, the fourheaded Brahmá was produced, the immediate agent of creation, the materials of which, as far as this universe consisting of fourteen Lokas or worlds is concerned, lay concealed within the same recess from which he issued.

Brahmá, the Creator, is in fact only an embodied portion of the Rajo Guṇa, the quality of passion or desire, by which the world was called into being. Rudra is the embodied Tamo Guṇa, the attribute of darkness or wrath, and the destructive fire by which the universe is annihilated, and Vishnú is the embodied Sattwa Guña, or property of mercy and goodness, by which the world is preserved; the three exist in one, and one in three; as the Veda is divided into three and is yet but one, and they are all Ásrita, or comprehended within that one being who is Parama or supreme, Guhya or secret, and Sarvátmá the soul of all things.

So far the theology of the Váyu Purána agrees with the deism of the Vedánta, but it presently deviates from this doctrine in the manner common to all the Puráñas, and to a purport which may be supposed to have mainly influenced the present form of these compositions. Agreeably to the Vedánta school, the Supreme Being, though of one nature with his emanations, possesses a sort of separate existence, and is always Nirguña or void of attributes. According to the Pauránik doctrines however, he is not merely Nirguña, but is occasionally Saguña or Sakalyána guña, possessed of attributes, or at least of all excellent attributes. In this latter case he becomes perceptible, and appears in the form either of Vishnú or Síva, according to the sect to which the work that so describes him appertains: his appearances are regarded as his Lílá or pastime, and in this sense, the Váyu Purána observes, the Paramátmá, or Yogeśwara, has engaged in various sports and consequently assumed a variety of incarnations, and is known by different names.

The successive stages of the creation of the world are enumerated as in the Kúrma Purāṇa, and amount to nine. They are somewhat differently named in one or two instances, but the meaning is probably alike. The nine Sargas are the Mahat, Bhúta, Aindreyaka, Maukhya, Tairyaksrotas, Úrddhasrotas, Arvaksrotas, Anugraha, and Kaumára*, or matter, the elements, the senses, the earth, animals, gods, men, goblins, and Brahmá's sons, a list agreeing with that of the Kúrma Purāṇa, except in the third, which is there called the Tejassarga, or creation of light or lustre. The two works also agree in calling the three first creations Prákṛita, or elementary, and the six last Vaikṛita or secondary, the elements being only made to assume Vikṛiti or change of form.

The subject of creation is continued through the 7th and 8th chapters, and the next sections are occupied with directions to practise abstract devotion, and obtain a knowledge of the Supreme Being, interspersed with an account of the origin and duties of various sages, and the attributes and power of some of the forms of Śiva. In the eighteenth chapter commences an enumeration of the Kalpas which is continued through the 19th and 20th. Thirty-three Kalpas are mentioned, the last of which is called the Viśwarúpa or Śweta, from the prevailing form of Śiva being of a white complexion. From this circumstance it appears to be the same with the Vaishnáva Várāha

kalpa, in which Śiva is incarnate on the mountain Chhagala as the Muni Śweta; having for his disciples Śwaita, Śwetaśikha, Śwetāsya and Śwetaloḥita*, the same who are mentioned in the Kūrma Purāṇa; the list of the Kalpas is followed by that of the Mahāyugas in the present Manwantara, in each Dwāpara of which, as well as a Vedavyāsa, there is an incarnation of Śiva, who has four sons or disciples, all Mahāyogīs and portions of the divinity. Those of the present period are Lakulī, and his sons Kuśika, Gārgya, Mitraḥa, and Rushta; the scene of their Yoga is called the Kāyārohaṇa Kshetra on mount Meru.

The subject of creation is not yet dismissed, and blended with illustrations of Śiva's supremacy continues through several other chapters. In the 23rd chapter Brahmā and Vishṇu are introduced as propitiating Mahādeva and receiving boons from his favour. To Brahmā he grants progeny; to Vishṇu, praise; admitting him to be along with himself the source of all things, though in an inferior degree, thus he says to Vishṇu "I am Agni or fire, thou art Soma the moon; thou art the night, I the day, thou art falsehood, I am truth: thou art sacrifice, I am the fruit of it; thou art knowledge, I am that that is to be known," &c.

The origin of Rudra from Brahmā by virtue of the boon given to him, and the various appellations assigned by Brahmā to that form of Śiva are next detailed, and this is followed by an account of the families of the seven Ṛishis, Bhṛigu, Marīchi, Angiras, Kardama or Pulaha, Pulastya, Kratu, and Vaśishṭha. Atri is not mentioned here, but his wife Anasúyā is named as the mother of Śruti, the wife of the son of Kardama or Pulaha, named also Kardama, from which alliance the patronymic Átreya is applied in the text to the descendants of that sage. The place left by Atri's exclusion is occupied by Bhṛigu, who it appears is considered as a form of Mahádeva. The descendants of Bhṛigu are called Bhārgavas, and a branch of them sprung from the grandson of Bhṛigu named Mṛikaṇḍa are termed Márkaṇḍeyas; the descendants of Marīchi are the Káśyapas from Kaśyapa his grand-son, the posterity of Angiras are the Ángirasas; of Pulastya the Paulastyas, of Vaśishṭha the Váśishṭhas, and of Kratu the pigmy sages called Bálakhilyas. These denominations and genealogical classifications, as well as several other details to be found in the same chapter, differ materially from the notions more generally received. We are not yet prepared to say how far they are peculiar to this Purāṇa.

Some curious, and as far as yet known, peculiar mythology follows, describing the different kinds of Agni or fire, and particularising the Pitṛis as the same with the Ṛitus or seasons of the year. A mythological description of the divisions of time then ensues; it is clearly an attempt to allegorise the year and its divisions, in common with the worship of collective ancestors by fire; hence the year is called Agni, the seasons the Pitṛis, and the five portions of animate and inanimate creation of men, birds, beasts, reptiles, and trees, &c. are the five Ártavas, the sons of the seasons or progeny of time: the allegory however is rather perplexed, and the whole description mystified and obscure. The names given to the months and seasons here are double. One set being the usual terms, and the other being peculiar: the names of the months are the same as those cited by Sir William Jones from the Vedas, as the names of the solar months (A. R. III. 258.) The seasons as the Pitṛis are called Káśa, Agni, Jíva, Sudháván, Manyamána and Ghora.

The Pitṛis are distinguished into two classes, the Várhishadras and Agnishwáttas; these are said to have had two daughters, Mená and Dháriní; the former became the wife of Himávāt, the latter wedded Meru, and from her was descended Daksha, the mention of whom gives occasion for the narration of his celebrated sacrifice, and for a number of stanzas in praise of Śiva's supremacy.

The 30th chapter contains a very summary account of some royal dynasties, and then particularises the duration of the four ages as 12,000 years. This calculation implies that the years are years of the gods, such being the period of a Maháyuga, agreeably to Paurāṇik chronology, at the same time the text does not specify what years are intended*. As analogous to the divisions of time, the Purāṇa itself is here stated to consist of 12,000 stanzas; a number different from that stated in the Matsya which assigns twice that amount or 24,000 Ślokas to the Vāyu Purāṇa.

* The proportion in which the years are divided are,

A number of chapters then follow, appropriated to Paurāṇik geography, the description of mount Meru and the residence of the gods, the seven continents and the divisions of the universe above and below the earth; considerable portions of these chapters have been translated by the late Colonel Wilford. The Paurāṇik system is here very fully and, upon the whole, distinctly detailed. The chief difficulties that occur being perhaps rather the fault of the transcript than of the original work.

The same remark applies to the chapters that follow, in which the astronomy of the Purāṇas is detailed with the same minuteness as the geography: on these two topics, therefore, the Vāyu Purāṇa is a valuable authority.

Some of this astronomy is rather unusual, the relative sizes and situations of the planets, their cars, their steeds, and other appurtenances, and their revolving round Dhruva or the pole, to which they are attached by cords of air, as the potter's wheel turns on its pivot, are in all the ordinary strain; but we have a statement regarding the length of a Yuga, and the commencement of the solar year, which are not conformable to received notions, or the actual state of things.

It is said, for instance, that a Yuga consists of five years; what kind of Yuga is intended is not specified. Bentley (A. R. VIII. 227) cites the Graha Manjari for a Mahá Yuga of five years, and in his last work on the ancient astronomy of the Hindus he refers the construction of a cycle of five years to what he considers the first period of Hindu astronomy, or from B. C. 1181 to 961.

This cycle it is said begins when the sun is in Śravaṇa, and it is again stated that Śravaṇa is the first of the Nakshatras, and Mággha the first of the months; according to the authority just cited, such could have been the case only between the years 204 B. C. and A. D. 44. when the year began with the month Mággha. If Mr. Bentley is correct, this portion of the Purāṇa at least is of considerable antiquity, whatever may be the date of the rest (Ancient Hindu Astronomy, p. 271). Mr. Bentley also adds that the mode of computation by which the commencement of the year was made to begin with a different month and asterism was entirely laid aside by the Hindu astronomers subsequent to A. D. 538.

The same chapter contains a description of the Śiśumāra, which is interpreted by Mr. Davis to typify the celestial sphere (A. R. II. 402). The description is to a similar effect with that which he has translated from the Bhágavata*, but is shorter and less particular. There is also this rather unintelligible addition, that the stars of the sphere never set; but the passage may signify, that they are not annihilated at the usual periods of destruction. The text is in this place evidently incorrect, and the translation being made from a single copy, it is not safe to venture any emendation.

A legendary account of Nílakańtha or the blue-necked Śiva follows, and the description of the classes of the Pitris, and their feeding upon the lunar nectar ensues. The introduction of obsequial ceremonies and the worship of the manes appears to have originated with Pururavas, a not unlikely circumstance, and one which explains the legend of his being descended both from the sun and moon; the worship of the manes being connected with the conjunction of the luminaries. The list of Pitris differs in some respect from that of Manu, and from that given in a manual used by the Brahmans of Bengal, in which a verse cited from the Váyu Purāṇa enumerates the following as the seven classes, Saumyas, Agnishwáttas, Varhishadas, Havishmantas, Ushmapás, and Ájyapás. In the chapter now under consideration there are but four particularised: the Saumyas or Somapás; the Kavyas or Ájyapás; the Varhishadas, and Agnishwáttas. Three others are merely named, the Ushmapás, Devakírttyas, and apparently the Lekhas and Bahwikásyas;

* [V, 23. Vishnú Pur. II, 12.]  [Vishnú Pur. p. 321.]

but these are unusual and probably inaccurate appellations. The whole of the section is obscure, incorrect, and often unintelligible. The same may be said of the two remaining chapters, which treat of the divisions of time and the influence of the four ages.

Without being in possession of the contents of the remaining portion, at least one-half of the Váyu Purána, it is impossible to offer any opinion on the date as derivable from internal testimony. As far as the portion analysed extends, it may be considered perhaps as the oldest of the actually existing Puráñas, and it has every appearance of being a genuine work, conforming more closely than any yet examined to the definition of a Purána, and admitting few of the unconnected digressions and legendary absurdities by which the course of these compilations is so commonly interrupted, and the established order widely disarranged or wholly obliterated.

The Váyu Purána is not unfrequently omitted in lists of the eighteen Puráñas, but in that case it is considered to be the same with the Śaiva Purána, which takes its place. As now met with, however, the two works are not identical.

HINDU FICTION.

From the Oriental Quarterly Magazine. Calc., March 1824, p. 63—77.

It was intimated on a former occasion¹ that Hindu Literature included collections of domestic narrative, of an extent surpassing that of any other people, anterior to the two last centuries, and of an antiquity at the least exceeding similar compilations in any Oriental tongue; and that it was consequently probable that much of the invention displayed on the revival of letters in Europe was referable to an Indian origin. In confirmation of these opinions, the learned labours of the Baron de Sacy were then cited, and his history of the migrations of Pilpay's Fables presented to our readers. Those fables, in their former, and in their modern and more authentic shape, are well known, and need not be here adverted to; and it will be easy to adduce other proofs of the accuracy of our sentiments.

The study of the Hindi and Bengali languages has rendered a number of persons familiar with the Sin-hásan Battísí and Beítál Pachísí, or the narratives related to Bhoja by the statues which supported his throne, and the tales told to Vikramáditya by the spirit he endeavoured to make captive for the magician. Both these are originally Sanskrit, and exist in detached forms, as well as embodied with other compilations. There is also another collection of tales in which Vikrama plays a prominent part, the Vikrama Charitra; and another compilation, the Víra Charitra, has Saliváhana for its hero. The Tútí Náma, or Tales of a Parrot, has a Sanskrit prototype in the Śuka Saptatí. The Kádambarí of Báña Bhatta, and the Daśa Kumára of Dańdí, are collections of entertaining narratives growing out of one entire plan. A more miscellaneous compilation is the Kathárhava, or Sea of Narratives, a work in four books, of which the two first are the Beítál Pachísí and Sinhásan Battísí; and the two last contain miscellaneous stories, probably from some original no longer known. The largest and most interesting collection, however, yet met with is the Kathá Sarit Ságará, the Ocean of the Streams of Narrative, or, as more generally, though less correctly denominated, the Great Narrative, or Vríhat Kathá. This collection is not only more important than either of the preceding, from its copiousness and variety, but because its history is well authenticated, whilst considerable uncertainty obscures their date and origin.

Somadeva, the compiler of the Vríhat Kathá, states, at the conclusion of his work, that it was composed for the recreation of the grandmother of Harsha Deva, a pious old lady, a great patroness of the Brahmans, and a zealous worshipper of Śiva and his spouse. Harsha Deva, king of Kashmir, was the son of Kalāśa, the son of Ananta, the son of Saṅgrāma Rājā, all in succession sovereigns of the same country. The genealogy thus given we can verify. The eighth table of the dynasties of Kashmir kings in Gladwin's Āyīni Akbarī, runs thus: Sangrama, who reigned two months; Hurray, twenty two days; Ananta, five years and five months; Kulussder, twenty six years; Ungruss, twenty two days; and Hurruss*. These names are corrupted by their twofold transfiguration, first in Persian, and then in Roman characters; but they still retain their primitive form sufficiently to be at once identifiable with the Sanskrit denominatives. Abūlfazl gives us two more princes, it is true, than Somadeva; but their joint reigns amount to but forty-four days, and they are chronologically nonentities. There was, probably, also very good reason for Somadeva's omitting them, as, if they were either infants or individuals of mature years, the shortness of the reigns indicates violence or usurpation. Taking the total period, as stated in the Āyīni Akbarī, all these princes reigned less than thirty-two years. We know from good authority, that Saṅgrāma ascended the throne of Kashmir about 1027; and Hurruss, or Harsha, therefore, came to the crown in 1059. He reigned, according to Abūlfazl, but twelve years, and consequently Somadeva wrote between 1059 and 1071*, if not, indeed, a few years earlier. The latter seems most probable, by the dedication to the grandmother of this prince, who, as the patron of religion, the endower of temples, and embellisher of the kingdom, must have possessed considerable authority, and was possibly regent during Harsha's minority. At any rate, however, these dates are quite sufficient to establish the priority of the compilation; and as it is also to be observed, that Somadeva takes care to call his work by that name, or a Sangraha, the materials are still older than the frame in which he has set them.

Besides the positive assertion, that he has only collected various stories, and arranged them in his own manner, Somadeva assigns a fictitious original to the whole, and represents the Vṛihat Kathá as proceeding from Śiva himself. To the original, or such part of it as was handed down, he professes to adhere, in terms which would seem to imply that there was actually a prior Sanskrit compilation known as the Vṛihat Kathá; but it may be doubted whether they are intended to assert any such fact, the fiction being part of his plan, and well enough in keeping with the character of his work. Some writers, however, amongst the Hindus, have maintained the reality of the original, and attributed it to Guṇádhya, as to an actually existing author*. Guṇádhya, as we shall see, is one of Soma-deva's personages, and, like many of his characters, may have been derived from a substantial prototype of the author of a collection of tales: however, they must have been written in some dialect, agreeably to our guide, or what he calls the Paiśáchi Bháshá, a conclusion still hostile to the prior existence of the Vríhat Kathá spoken of, as that is a Sanskrit composition. The fabulous origin of the stories, whatever portion of truth it may comprehend, suggests the introductory chapters of the compilation; and we shall therefore give the substance of them. We shall then proceed to the other chapters of the collection, compressing, of course, the narrative as much as possible, and omitting such anecdotes and tales as are least amusing or characteristic.

Introduction.

On the summit of Kailása, a lofty peak of the Himalaya range, resided the mighty deity Maheśwara, attended by innumerable spirits and genii, and worshipped even by the superior divinities. The daughter of the mountain monarch, and the spouse of Mahádeva, propitiated her lord by her celestial strains; and, being pleased by her adulations, he proffered her whatever boon she might request. Her only demand was to receive instruction from his lips, and to hear from him such narrations as were yet unknown to the immortals or herself.

In compliance with the desire of Bhavání, Śiva repeated to her the history of the worship offered him by Brahmá and Vishnú in former ages, and the favour found by the latter, on account of his wish to be accepted as a servant of Maheśwara. He also related to her the events of Daksha's sacrifice, the death of Satí, and her being born again as the daughter of the king of the snowy mountains, and once more his bride. Deví, offended, here interrupted his narration, and told him these things she was not desirous to hear: on which Śiva, giving orders that no person should be admitted, proceeded to reveal to the goddess those narratives which illustrate the felicity of the gods, the troubles of mankind, and the intermediate and varying conditions of the spirits of earth and heaven.

It happened that Pushpadanta, one of the god's principal attendants, came to the palace gate, and was refused admission by the warder. As he was a great favourite with his master, and had always ready access to his person, the refusal excited his astonishment and curiosity; and, rendering himself invisible, he passed in, determined to ascertain why entrance was so rigorously barred. In this manner having come to where Śiva and Bhavání were seated, he overheard all the marvellous stories repeated by the deity. When these were concluded, he retired as he had entered, unobserved, and going home communicated the narratives to his wife Jayá, it being impossible to keep wealth or secrets from a woman. Jayá, equally unable to preserve silence, communicated what she had heard to her fellow attendants on Párvatí; and the affair soon became known to the goddess and her lord. As the punishment of impertinence, Pushpadanta was condemned to a human birth, and his friend Mályaván, who presumed to intercede for him, was sentenced to a like fate. Being, however, subdued by the distress of Jayá, the offended goddess fixed a term to their degradation, and thus spake: When Pushpadanta, encountering a Yaksha, who has been doomed by Kuvera to haunt the Vindhya mountains as a goblin, shall recollect his original condition, and shall repeat the tales he has rashly overheard, the curse shall no more prevail. So saying, she ceased, and the two culprits instantly, like a flash of lightning, blazed and disappeared.

After a due interval, Mályaván was born at Pratihá¹, under the name Guṇádhya, and Pushpadanta at Kauśámbí², as Vararuchi. The latter, when ar-

¹ [or Pratihána] the capital of Śáliváhana, supposed to be the same with Pattan, or Pyetan, on the Godávari. [Lassen, Ind. Alt. II, 884 ff.]

² Kauśámbí succeeded Hástinapur as the capital of the emperors of India. Its precise site has not been ascertained, but it was probably somewhere in the Doáb, or at any rate not far from the west bank of the Jamná, as it bordered upon Magadha, and was not far from the Vindh hills. Hamilton thinks it probable, that the ruins which have been called those of Hástinapur are rived at years of discretion, found the goblin follower of Kuvera at Vindhya Vāsini¹, and recollecting his origin, repeated to him the seven great narratives of Śiva, each comprehending a hundred thousand verses: he also gave him the history of his mortal adventures.

Story of Vararuchi.

I was born at Kauśāmbī, the son of a Brahman, named Somadatta, who died whilst I was a child, and left my mother, Vasudattā, in indigence with the charge of my education. Whilst struggling with distress, it chanced that two Brahmans, named Indradatta and Vyādi, stopped at our dwelling, and solicited hospitality for the night, as they were strangers, and those of Kauśāmbī, as the former city was carried away by the Ganges before the latter was built. The concluding assertion, however, wants authority, as the Vishnu Purāṇa and the Vṛihat Kathā merely notice the removal of the capital, without stating any cause. It is said, that there are ruins at Karāri, or Karāli, about 14 miles from Allāhābād, on the west road, which may indicate the site of Kauśāmbī; and in Cooseah, another stage on the road, we may trace an affinity to the name. It is not impossible, also, that the mounds of rubbish about Kurrah may conceal some vestiges of the ancient capital—a circumstance rendered the more probable by the inscription found there, which specifies Kāṭa, as comprised within Kauśāmba maṇḍala, or district of Kauśāmbī.—As. Res. IX, 433. [Lassen, Ind. Alt. III, 201. Vivien de Saint-Martin in “Mémoires sur les contrées occidentales”. Paris: 1858, II, 352.]

weary with long travel. They were received. Whilst sitting together, we heard a drum, and my mother exclaimed, in a tone of regret, Your father's friend, boy, the actor Navananda, holds some representation. I replied, Do not be vexed, mother, I will go to see what is exhibited, and will bring every word to you. This vaunt astonished our guests, who, to try my memory, recited the *Prátisákhyā*¹, which I immediately after repeated to them. They then accompanied me to the play, of which I repeated every speech to my mother, on our return home. One of the Brahmins, *Vyádi*², then addressed my mother, and told her I was the person of whom he was in search.

It appeared that he and Indradatta were born at Vetasa, cousins, and were both left orphans at an early age. They were after a time commanded in a dream to seek for a preceptor at Pátaliputra, in a Brahman, named Varsha; and the youths repairing thither discovered him, but found him an idiot. They ascertained, however, that in consequence of a special boon conferred upon him by *Kumáraswámí*³, he was endowed with every science, under a condition to impart it only to a Brahman, who should retain the whole upon once hearing the lesson. As neither of these Brahmans were gifted with such retentive faculties, they were accordingly in search of one so qualified, through whose intermediation they might be instructed in all that Varsha was competent to teach.

Having obtained my mother's assent, Vyádi and Indradatta conducted me with them to the dwelling of Varsha. There the gifted Brahman repeated to us the whole of the Vedas, and their dependent sciences. This repetition sufficed for me, and when I had once more gone over the subject, Vyádi acquired his lesson. His communication of it again to Indradatta fixed it in the recollection of the latter. The circumstances were speedily noised abroad; and Nanda¹, who then reigned at Pátaliputra, hearing of them, adopted Varsha as the object of his munificence, and enabled him to spend the remainder of his days in affluence and ease. The defects of his understanding were also dissipated, and he became a teacher of great repute.

Origin of Pátaliputra.

The capital of Nanda, Pátaliputra, was a place of great sanctity, being the favoured shrine of Lakshmi and Saraswatí. Its origin is thus narrated. A Brah-

¹ The contemporary existence of Nanda with Vararuchi and Vyádi is a circumstance of considerable interest in the literary history of the Hindus, as the two latter are writers of note on philological topics. Vararuchi is also called in this work Kátyáyana, who is one of the earliest commentators on Páṇini. Nanda is the predecessor, or one of the predecessors of Chandraman from the south, whilst engaged on a pilgrimage to Kanakhala, near Gangádwára¹, died, and left three sons. They subsequently repaired to Rájagríha² for instruction, and thence removed to Chinchiní, a city on the sea shore, south from the shrine of Kumára Swámí. They were kindly entertained by Bhojika, a Brahman, who gave them his three daughters in marriage. After a time, the country was afflicted by famine; and the three husbands, deserting their wives, set off to seek their fortunes elsewhere. Talents and relationship touch not the hearts of the wicked. The wife of the second brother proved pregnant, and was delivered of a son, whose helpless situation attracted the pity, and propitiated the guardian care of Deví and Śiva. The first effect of this powerful patronage was the discovery, by the women, of an immense treasure, which being judiciously expended, elevated the boy to princely possessions. By the advice of his grandfather's friend, and his own guardian Yajnadatta, Putraka, as the lad had been named, distributed publicly gupta, or Sandrocoptos; and consequently the chief institutes of Sanskrit grammar are thus dated from the fourth century before the Christian era. We need not suppose that Somadeva took the pains to be exact here; but it is satisfactory to be made acquainted with the general impression of a writer, who has not been biassed in any of his views by Pauránik legends and preposterous chronology. splendid gifts, at various seasons, to the Brahmans, in the hope of attracting and discovering his father. The scheme succeeded, and the three brothers returned to claim their wives, and interest in the young Rájá. The claim was joyfully recognized; but the evil propensities of the fraternity prevailing over natural affection, they conspired the death of the prince, and his own father led him into a temple, where he left him to be murdered by assassins, covertly stationed for the purpose. The murderers were, however, induced, by the intreaties and presents of Putraka, to let him escape, and he fled into the forests. His father and uncles met the fate that ever attends the ungrateful¹: the officers of the young Rájá accused them of having killed him, and falling upon the culprits, sacrificed them to his memory.

In the mean time, Putraka, whilst wandering in the woods, beheld two men struggling with each other. He enquired who they were. They replied, that they were the sons of Mayásur, and were contending for a magic cup, staff, and pair of slippers: the first of which yielded inexhaustible viands, the second generated any object which it delineated, and the third transported a person through the air. The strongest of the two was to possess these articles. Putraka then observed to them, that violence was a very improper mode of settling their pretensions, and that it would be better they should adjust the dispute by less objectionable means. He therefore proposed, that they should run a race for the contested articles, and the fleetest win them. They agreed, and set off. They were no sooner at a little distance, than Putraka, putting his feet into the slippers, and seizing the cup and staff, mounted into the air, and left the racers to lament in vain their being outwitted.

Putraka alighted at a city called Ákarshiká, and took up his residence with an old woman, from whom he received accounts of the beauty of the king's daughter, whose name was Pátali. Having in consequence formed an intimacy with the princess, he carried her off, and alighted on the bank of the Ganges, where tracing the walls and buildings of a city with his staff, a stately town immediately arose. The people attracted to this place he maintained by the stores of his cup; and the place, named after his bride and himself Pátaliputraka, became the capital of a mighty empire¹.

Whilst residing with my preceptor, I became acquainted with his niece Upakośá, at the festival of In-dra; and as we were inspired by mutual affection, we were soon married, with the consent of our relations. After having enjoyed the felicity of a wedded life some short time, I was induced to relinquish it, and repair to the Himálaya Mountains.

Amongst the pupils of Varsha was a Brahman, named Páñini, a fellow of remarkable dullness, and so incapable of learning, that he was at last expelled from the classes. Deeply sensible of this disgrace, he had recourse to devotion; and setting off to the snowy mountains, propitiated Śiva by a course of severe austerities, in consequence of which the god communicated to him the system of grammar which bears his name. Returning in triumph, he challenged me to a public disputation, and we argued on an equality for seven days: on the eighth the discussion was interrupted by a hideous noise, which disconcerted me and my abettors, and left Páñini without a competitor. From this time his grammar supplanted mine, and Inand slippers will have, no doubt, struck our readers as fictions with which they have long been familiar. The story is told almost in the same words in the Behár Dánish, a purse being substituted for the rod; and Jehándár obtains possession of them in a very similar manner. Weber (Eastern Romances, Introd. 39,) has noticed the analogy which the slippers bear to the cap of Fortunatus. The inexhaustible purse, although not mentioned here, is of Hindu origin also; and a fraudulent representative of it makes a great figure in one of the stories of the Dasa Kumára [ch. 2. dra's and all others, and we were compelled to acknowledge his superiority.

The degradation I thus experienced poisoned all my enjoyments. I determined therefore to have recourse to the origin of my humiliation, and by acquiring the favour of Mahádeva, regain my lost distinction. I therefore departed to the mountains, leaving to Upakośá the management of our affairs.

Story of Upakośá, the Wife of Vararuchi.

Whilst I was thus absent, my wife, who performed with pious exactitude her ablutions in the Ganges, attracted the notice and desires of several suitors, especially of the king's domestic priest, the commander of the guard, and the young prince's preceptor, who annoyed her by their importunities, and terrified her by their threats, till at last she determined to expose and punish their depravity.

Having fixed upon the plan, she made an appointment for the same evening with her three lovers, each being to come to her house an hour later than the other. Being desirous of propitiating the gods, she sent for our banker to obtain money to distribute in alms; and when he arrived, he expressed the same passion, as the rest, on her compliance with which he promised to make over to her the money that I had placed in his hands; or on her refusal he would retain it to his own use. Apprehending the loss of our property, therefore, she made a similar assignation with him; and desired him to come to her house that evening, at an hour when she calculated on having disposed of the first comers, for whose reception, as well as his, she arranged with her attendants the necessary preparations.

At the expiration of the first watch of the night, the Preceptor of the prince arrived. Upakośá affected to receive him with great delight; and after some conversation, desired him to take a bath which her handmaids had prepared for him, as a preliminary condition to any further intimacy. The Preceptor made not the least objection, on which he was conducted into a retired and dark chamber, where his bath was ready. On undressing, his own clothes and ornaments were removed, and in their place a small wrapper given to him, which was a piece of cloth smeared with a mixture of oil, lamp black, and perfumes. Similar cloths were employed to rub him with after bathing, so that he was of a perfectly ebon colour from top to toe. The rubbing occupied the time till the second lover, (the Priest,) arrived, on which the women exclaimed, "Here is our master's particular friend—in, in here, or all will be discovered;" and hurrying their victim away, they thrust him into a long and stout wicker basket, fastened well by a bolt outside, in which they left him to meditate upon his mistress.

The Priest and the Commander of the guard were secured, as they arrived, in a similar manner; and it only remained to dispose of the Banker. When he made his appearance, Upakośá, leading him near the baskets, said aloud, You promise to deliver to me my husband's property; and he replied: The wealth your husband entrusted to me shall be yours. On which she turned towards the baskets, and said, Let the gods hear the promise of Hirańyagupta. The bath was then proposed to the banker. Before the ceremony was completed, the day began to dawn, on which the servants desired him to make the best of his way home, lest the neighbours should notice his departure; and with this recommendation they forced him, naked as he was, into the street. Having no alternative, the banker hastened to conceal himself in his own house, being chased all the way by the dogs of the town.

As soon as it was day, Upakośá repaired to the palace of Nanda, and presented a petition to the king against the banker for seeking to appropriate the property entrusted to him by her husband. The banker was summoned. He denied having ever received any money from me. Upakośá then said: When my husband went away, he placed our household gods in three baskets; they have heard this man acknowledge his holding a deposit of my husband's, and let them bear witness for me. The king, with some feeling of surprise and incredulity, ordered the baskets to be sent for; and they were accordingly produced in the open court. Upakośá then addressed them: Speak, gods, and declare what you overheard this banker say in our dwelling. If you are silent, I will unhouse you in this presence. Afraid of this menaced exposure, the tenants of the baskets immediately exclaimed, “Verily, in our presence, the banker acknowledged possession of your wealth.” On hearing these words, the whole court was filled with surprise; and the banker, terrified out of his senses, acknowledged the debt, and promised restitution.

The business being adjusted, the king expressed his curiosity to see the household divinities of Upakośú, and she very readily complied with his wish. The baskets being opened, the culprits were dragged forth by the attendants, like so many lumps of darkness. Being presently recognized, they were overwhelmed with the laughter and derision of all the assembly. As soon as the merriment had subsided, Nanda begged Upakośú to explain what it all meant, and she acquainted him with what had occurred. Nanda was highly incensed, and, as the punishment of their offence, banished the criminals from the kingdom. He was equally pleased with the virtue and ingenuity of my wife, and loaded her with wealth and honours. Her family were likewise highly gratified by her conduct, and she obtained the admiration and esteem of the whole city¹.

I now returned from my sojourn in the Snowy Mountains, where by the favour of Śiva I had acquired the Pāṇinīya grammar. This I communicated to my preceptor Varsha, as the fruit of my penance; and as he wished to learn a new system, I instructed him in that revealed by Swámī Kumára. Vyádi and Indradatta then applied to Varsha for like instruction; but he desired them first to bring him a very considerable present. As they were wholly unable to raise the sum, they proposed applying for it to the king, and requested me to accompany them to his camp, which was at that time at Ayodhyá. I consented, and we set off.

When we arrived at the encampment, we found everybody in distress, Nanda being just dead. Indradatta, who was skilled in magic, said: This event need not disconcert us; I will transfuse my vitality into the lifeless body of the king. Do you, Vararuchi, then solicit the money: I will grant it, and then resume my own person, of which do you, Vyádi, take charge till the spirit returns¹. This was assented to, and our companion accordingly entered the carcase of the king.

agrees with the Hindu original, in putting the lovers out of the way, and disrobing them by the plea of the bath.

Story of Yogananda.

The revival of Nanda caused universal rejoicing. The minister Śakatāla alone suspected something extraordinary in the resuscitation. As the heir to the throne, however, was yet a child, he was well content, that no change should take place, and determined to keep his new master in the royal station. He immediately, therefore, issued orders that search should be made for all the dead bodies in the vicinage, and that they should forthwith be committed to the flames. In pursuance of this edict, the guards came upon the deserted carcase of Indradatta, and burning it as directed, our old associate was compelled to take up his abode permanently in the tenement, which he had purposed to occupy but for a season. He was by no means pleased with the change, and in private lamented it with us, being in fact degraded by his elevation, as having relinquished the exalted rank of a Brahman for the inferior condition of a Śúdra.

Vyádi having received the sum destined for our master, took leave of his companion Indradatta, whom we shall henceforth call Yogananda*. Before his departure, however, he recommended to the latter to get rid of Śakatāla, the minister, who had penetrated his secret, and who would, no doubt, raise the prince Chandragupta to the throne, as soon as he had attained to years of discretion. It would be better, therefore, to anticipate him, and, as preparatory to that measure, to make me, Vararuchi, his minister. Vyádi then left us, and in compliance with his counsel, I became the confidential minister of Yogananda.

A charge was now made against Śakatála of having, under pretence of getting rid of dead carcasses, burnt a Brahman alive; and on this plea, he was cast into a dry well with all his sons. A plate of parched pulse and a pitcher of water were let down daily for their sustenance, just sufficient for one person. The father, therefore, recommended to the brothers to agree amongst themselves, which should survive to revenge them all, and relinquishing the food to him, resign themselves to die. They instantly acknowledged their avenger in him; and with stern fortitude, refusing to share in the daily pittance, one by one expired.

After some time, Yogananda, intoxicated, like other mortals, with prosperity, became despotie and unjust. I found my situation, therefore, most irksome, as it exposed me to a tyrant's caprice, and rendered me responsible for acts, which I condemned. I therefore sought to secure myself a participator in the burthen, and prevailed upon Yogananda, to release Śakatála from his captivity, and reinstate him in his authority. He therefore once again became the minister of the king.

It was not long before I incurred the displeasure of Yogananda, so that he resolved to put me to death. Śakatála, who was rejoiced to have this opportunity of winning me over to his cause, apprised me of my danger, and helped me to evade it, by keeping me concealed in his palace. Whilst thus retired, the son of the king, Hirañyagupta, lost his senses, and Yogananda now lamented my absence. His regret moved Śakaśāla to acknowledge that I was living, and I was once more received into favour. I effected the cure of the prince, but received news, that disgusted me with the world, and induced me to resign my station, and retire into the forests. My disgrace and disappearance had led to a general belief, that I had been privately put to death. This report reached my family. Upakośā burnt herself, and my mother died broken-hearted.

Inspired with the profoundest grief, and more than ever sensible of the transitory duration of human happiness, I repaired to the shades of solitude, and the silence of meditation. After living for a considerable period in my hermitage, the death of Yogananda was related to me by a Brahman, who was travelling from Ayodhyá, and had rested at my cell.

Śakaśāla, brooding on his plan of revenge, observed one day a Brahman of mean appearance digging in a meadow, and asked him what he was doing there. Cháñakya, the Brahman, replied: I am rooting out this grass, which has hurt my foot. The reply struck the minister as indicative of a character, which would contribute to his designs, and he engaged him, by the promise of a large reward and high honours, to come and preside at the Śráddha, which was to be celebrated next new moon at the palace. Cháñakya arrived, anticipating the most respectful treatment; but Yogananda had been previously persuaded by Śakatāla to assign precedence to another Brahman, Subandhu, so that when Chāṇakya came to take his place, he was thrust from it with contumely. Burning with rage, he threatened the king before all the court, and denounced his death within seven days. Nanda ordered him to be turned out of the palace. Śakatāla lived him into his house; and persuading Chāṇakya that he was wholly innocent of being instrumental to his ignominious treatment, contributed to encourage and inflame his indignation. Chāṇakya thus protected, practised a magical rite, in which he was a proficient, and by which, on the seventh day, Nanda was deprived of life. Śakatāla, on the father's death, effected the destruction of Hiraṇyagupta, his son, and raised Chandragupta¹, the son of the genuine Nanda, to the throne. Chāṇakya became the prince's minister; and Śakatāla, having attained the only object of his existence, retired to end his days in the woods.

End of the Story of Vararuchi.

All these things confirmed my satisfaction with the life I had adopted, and inspired me with the more anxious desire of being quickly liberated from such a fickle and feverish world. I therefore came to offer my prayers for final emancipation to Vindhya Vásiní, when I encountered you, and was reminded of my former state. I have related to you the wonderful narratives I learnt unbidden from the mighty Mahádeva. The period of my transformation and punishment has expired. I therefore depart to the holy asylum of Vadariká. Do you yet tarry here awhile, until a Brahman, Guṇádhya, arrive. Impart to him what you have learnt from me, and your task will then be accomplished. So saying, Vararuchi took his leave of Káñabhúti, and departed to Vadarikáśrama, where, throwing off this mortal coil, he resumed, as Pushpadanta, his seat amongst the brilliant spirits of heaven.

Story of Mályaván, or Guṇádhya.

After Vararuchi had departed, it happened that his friend Mályaván, who had been born as Guṇádhya, came to Vindhya Vásiní, and encountered Káñabhúti. Upon beholding him, he recollected his original condition, and requested him to communicate the stories he had heard from Vararuchi, as the means of their being mutually restored to their state in heaven. Having complied with his request, Káñabhúti begged him to relate his adventures on earth, to which Guṇádhya readily acceded.

Story of Guṇādhya.

Somadatta, a Brahman of Pratishthāna¹, died, and left two sons and an unmarried daughter. The latter, named Śrutārthā, became a mother before she was a bride; and when questioned by her brothers, she asserted that she had been espoused privately by Kīrtisena, the nephew of the serpent monarch Vāsuki, who upon the brethren continuing incredulous appeared to them and acknowledged the marriage. I was born his son. After a short time, my mother and my uncles died, and left me friendless. I repaired to the south, and having acquired the knowledge becoming my caste, returned to my native city. As I wandered through Pratishthāna, I mingled with various orders of men, and overheard their conversation², until I found my way to the royal palace. Having attracted the notice and approbation of one of the ministers, I was introduced by him to the king Sātaváhana; and the prince, being pleased with my address, retained me in his service.

Kánabhúti now interrupted Guṇádhya, and asked him to explain how Sātaváhana had acquired that appellation. Guṇádhya then related the story.

Legend of Sātaváhana¹.

There was a monarch, called Dípakarṇi, whose wife, named Śaktimati, more dear to him than his existence, whilst reposing in a bower in the garden, was bitten by a snake, and died. The king, overcome with grief for her loss, made a vow to observe perpetual continence—a vow to which he rigidly adhered, although the want of a son to succeed him in the kingdom was a subject of profound affliction to him. Whilst thus distressed, he was directed by Śiva, in a dream, in what manner to obtain a son and successor, without violating his faith to his departed wife. In obedience to the god's commands, he repaired to a certain forest to hunt; and whilst thus employed, met, as he had been forewarned, a lovely boy, riding upon a monstrous lion. Still acting as he had been enjoined, the king aimed an arrow at the beast, and he fell as dead. Immediately, however, uprose from the carcase a celestial form, who thus addressed the astonished monarch. "Dismiss your apprehension. I am a Yaksha, Sāta by name. It was my chance to see and love the beautiful daughter of a holy sage: my passion was returned; and this boy whom you behold is our son. When the secret of our union was discovered, the angry sire condemned us both to wear the forms of brutes, during the remainder of our earthly career. My bride was liberated from the effects of the curse in givure, and are in many instances decidedly modern. The last work noticed is the Appendix to the Agni Purāṇa, which is no part of that Purāṇa, and is a modern composition. The legends relating to Śalivāhana may therefore, as is most likely, have been borrowed from the spurious gospels; but they do not, therefore, bear unfavourably upon the antiquity of the Purāṇas, as they are not found in the body of those works: how far they may be traced, even in the books cited, is a little doubtful, at least, as applicable to Śalivāhana; for in the legend said to be extracted in the same essay from the Rāja Tarangīnī, it is true, that the story is correctly given; but the person is not, as is said, Śalivāhana, nor in any way connected with his character. [The errors into which Wilford had fallen are fully exposed by Lassen, Ind. Alt., II, 361 ff. See also Append. VI, p. xxvii.]

¹ Sātaváhana is usually considered synonymous with Śáliváhana, the enemy of Vikramáditya, and the prince of whose juvenile career those marvels are narrated, which appear to be derived from the Evangelium Infantie, and other spurious gospels. (As. Res. Vol. X, p. 42.) At the same time, it is to be observed, that these stories are not to be found in the Purāṇas. The chief authority cited by the late Colonel Wilford is the Vikrama Charitra, a compilation of fables of uncertain date, and no consideration. He quotes also the Kumárika Khaṇḍa of the Skanda Purāṇa, for some circumstances of a less miraculous character; but even here the authority is very disputable, as the Khaṇḍas, or detached sections of the Purāṇas, have been multiplied at pleas-

ing birth to her son, and your shaft has rendered me the same kind office. I am now at liberty; but ere I depart to the region of the gods, I bequeath to you this child, to be cherished by you as your own." So saying, he vanished, leaving the boy with the king, who gladly received him, and gave him the name Sávatáhana, in reference to the appellation of his father, and the Váhana, or vehicle, on which the king had first beheld the infant mounted. Upon the death of his adoptive father, Sávatáhana succeeded to the throne, and became a mighty monarch.

Amongst the remarkable transactions of his reign was the introduction of a new grammar¹, the Kálápa, or Kátantra. This was communicated to the king for his special use by the god Kártikeya, who had been propitiated by the worship of Sarvavarmá, the king's minister. It was termed Kátantra, from its small extent, and Kálápa, from the peacock (Kalápa) on which Kumára Swámí rides.

¹ This grammar is extensively in use in the eastern parts of Bengal. The rules are attributed to Sarvavarmá, by the inspiration of Kártikeya, as narrated in the text. The vṛitti, or gloss, is the work of Durga Singh; and that again is commented on by Trilochana Dása and Kavirája. Vararuchi is the supposed author of an illustration of the Conjugations, and Śrípati Varmá of a Supplement. Other commentaries are attributed to Gopínátha, Kala Chandra, and Viśveśwara. [Aufrecht, Cat. Bodl. I, 168-70. Colebrooke, Miss. Essays, II, 44 f.]

Story of Guṇádhya—resumed.

The proficiency of the king in the new science being attained without my interference, I felt myself an unnecessary addition to his attendants, and accordingly took leave of him. Accompanied by two of my disciples, I set off for Vindhyavásinī to worship the goddess, having been so enjoined by a dream. On my way hither, I fell in with a variety of goblins, and acquired their language, which makes the fourth I have now mastered¹. When I first arrived, you were absent; but your return recalls to my recollection all the past, and I now anticipate a speedy restoration to the height from which I fell.

Kānabhūti, having heard the account from Guṇádhya, professed himself ready to communicate the great narrative he had heard from Vararuchi; but intimated his wish first to learn how Pushpadanta and Mályaván had attained a place amongst the bands of heaven. Guṇádhya in consequence related to him the following Story of Pushpadanta.

In a village on the banks of the Ganges lived Govindadatta, a Brahman. He had five sons, of goodly persons, but rude manners, and uncultivated minds.

¹ These are in another place said to be Sanskrit, Prakrit, Deśya, and Paisáchi.

A Brahman of great learning, having on one occasion, whilst the father was abroad, demanded the rites of hospitality at the house of Govindadatta, was treated with disrespect and derision by the youths, and was about to depart in wrath, when the father arrived. The severity with which both he and his wife rebuked the lads, pacified the Brahman, and induced him to accept their invitation to remain. The anger of his parents produced a favourable impression on one of the sons, Devadatta, who, repenting of his idle habits and unprofitable life, set off to Badarikásrama¹ to propitiate Śiva. The rigour of his austerities engaged the approbation of the god. Śiva appeared to him, and promised him that he should become possessed of learning, for which purpose he directed him to go to Pátaliputra, and study under Vedakumbha. Devadatta remained some time with this teacher, until his master's wife cast the eyes of illicit affection upon him, and endeavoured to win him to her desires. Devadatta, however, was not to be corrupted; and when he found he could in no other way avoid her importunities, he fled. He repaired to Pratishthána, where he studied with great diligence and success under another teacher of repute.

Whilst studying at Pratishthána, it chanced that Devadatta beheld the daughter of the king Suśarmá at a balcony of the palace. She also noticed him, and they were instantly fast bound in the indissoluble chains of love. After they had interchanged glances, she beckoned to him to approach. He obeyed: on which she took a flower, and having touched her teeth with it, threw it to him, and then disappeared. Devadatta, taking the flower, returned home. The flame that preyed upon his heart soon betrayed itself to the experience of his preceptor, and he quickly drew from him the secret of his passion. When he heard of the flower, and the manner in which it was presented, he immediately concluded that some mystery was concealed in the act, and at last explained it to signify an assignation, on the part of the princess, to meet Devadatta at a temple called Pushpa, (a flower.) The youth was charmed with this explanation, and set off to the temple to await the coming of the princess. On the 8th day of the fortnight, she repaired thither to offer her adorations, and entering within the chamber where her lover lay concealed, was immediately pressed to his bosom. She enquired how he had so readily apprehended her meaning: but when he confessed he was indebted to his preceptor's sagacity, rather than to his own, she was highly offended with his lack of discernment, and left him in displeasure.

Devadatta was now more wretched than ever, and his life was fast dissolving in the fire of separation; when Śambhu, commiserating his condition, sent one of his attendants, Panchasikha, to console and assist him. Panchasikha made the youth put on a female garb, whilst he assumed the appearance of an aged Brahman. Thus changed, they repaired to the palace, where the supposed Brahman addressed the monarch thus:—"King, I am an old man without connexions in your capital. I sent my only son on family affairs some time ago to a distant country, and he does not return. I am weary of expecting him, and fear some evil may have befallen him. I will therefore go forth in quest of him; but how can I dispose of my daughter-in-law in the mean time? I leave her, king, as a sacred deposit in your charge." The monarch, afraid of the Brahman's malediction, reluctantly accepted the trust, and the supposed Brahman departed. The daughter was transferred to the interior of the palace, where, revealing himself to the princess, Devadatta succeeded in pacifying her indignation, and recovering her regard. She listened to his suit with complacency, and they pledged their troth to each other by the ritual that unites in wedlock the inferior spirits of heaven¹.

When it became no longer possible to conceal their secret intercourse, the friendly sprite was summoned by a wish to their assistance—he appeared, and conveyed Devadatta out of the palace by night. The next morning he made the youth discard his female habiliments, and accompany him, again metamorphosed to a venerable Brahman, to the palace in the character of the son of whom he had been in search. He came, he said, to claim his daughter-in-law, and the king ordered her to be sent for; but all parties were struck with real, or seeming consternation, when it was announced that she was no where to be found. The king, at a loss to comprehend the possibility of her evasion, and recollecting old legends, suspected that the Brahman was not what he seemed to be, and, apprehensive of incurring his displeasure, professed himself willing to submit to any conditions he should impose. These were readily arranged, and the princess was given to the Brahman's supposed son, in exchange for the bride that he pretended to have lost. The princess bore a son; who was named Mahádhara. When the king was advanced in years, he retired to the forests, resigning his sovereignty to his grandson; and after witnessing the glory of Mahádhara, his parents also withdrew from the world to the silence of the hermitage: devoting all their thoughts to Śambhu, they obtained his favour; and when released from this mortal coil, they were elevated to the rank of spirits, attendant on the god and his celestial consort, as Pushpadanta and his wife Jayá, the same whose indiscreet curiosity had lately been punished by their temporary return to the infirmities of human nature.

Guṇádhya then proceeded. Having thus related to you the history of my friend and fellow spirit, I will now resume my own. In my former existence, Govindadatta, the father of Devadatta, was also mine: my name was Somadatta; and in imitation of the example of my brother I set off to the Himálaya mountains, to propitiate the crescent-crested deity. I performed austere penances in honour of him, and offered constant garlands to him, until, at last, he manifested himself, and proffered me a boon. I prayed to be admitted into the train of his attendants, and he granted my prayer, naming me, with reference to my offerings, Mályaván, (from Málá, a garland.) The community of our original has influenced the friendly connexion, which has ever subsisted between me and Pushpadanta, and rendered me a sharer in his recent humiliation.

Having thus communicated his adventures to Káñabhúti, Guñádhyā received from him the seven great tales, the cause of his and Pushpadanta's fall. Káñabhúti imparted them in the Paísáchí language, in which Guñádhyā wrote them with his own blood, as there was no procuring ink in the wilderness. The tales were comprised in seven lacks of stanzas: the communication of them was the work of seven years¹,

सप्तः सप्त जगन्ति सप्त मुनयः सप्ताब्धयः सप्त गाः ।

सप्त सप्त च मातरो भवभूतः सप्तानसाम्यादिह ॥

"The seven steeds, seven worlds, seven sages, seven oceans, seven and all the subordinate spirits of earth and air attended the daily recitation. At the close, Kánabhúti was liberated from the effects of his curse, and returned to his station, an attendant on the god of wealth.

Guñádhyā was now the only one who had a duty to fulfil before he was restored to his heavenly honours: this was the communication of the Great Tales to Sátaváhana, to secure their perpetuation upon earth; accordingly he repaired to the vicinity of Pratishthána, and sent the books by two of his disciples to the king. Sátaváhana treated the present with contempt, and desired the scholars to carry it back to their master; for a work, he observed, in the language of fiends could not be worth human perusal, and characters traced with blood were only suitable to their infernal origin. The disrespect shewn to such holy volumes affected Guñádhyā profoundly. Retiring to a neighbouring mountain, he read to his pupils, and the beasts of the field, and birds of the air, who flocked round him to listen, all the stories, except the history of Naraváhanadatta, throwing each of the series as he completed it, into a fire kindled for the purpose. The extraordinary character of Guñádhyā's auditory at last came to the king's ears, and he was induced to visit the spot, and verify the report in person. Upon finding that it was true, Sátaváhana humbled himself before the sage, and learned from him his story. He was then anxious to have possession of the tales; and the one lack out of the seven which had escaped the flames was presented to him by Guṇádhya, who presently, resuming his celestial character, returned to the service of Śiva. The stories were expounded to Sātaváhana by Guṇádhya's two disciples, Guṇadeva and Nandideva, and they were rewarded liberally with wealth and honours. Sātaváhana also had the tales translated into the Sanskrit language, and this preparatory account of their origin composed¹.

End of the Introduction.

THE FIRST, OR INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER OF THE HISTORY OF NARAVÁHANADATTA.

Birth of Udayana, or the king of Vatsa².

² Udayana is a celebrated character in Hindu fable: so Kālidāsa calls Oujein the populous resort of the bards who have celebrated the story of Udayana:

ed Varsha¹, is the extensive city Kauśámbí, the first monarch of which was Śatánika, the son of Janamejaya, whose father was Paríkshit, the son of Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna. Śatánika was killed in battle with the Titans, having gone to the assistance of Indra, and was succeeded in his throne by Sahasránika.

The fate of his father naturally interested Indra for the young prince, and he not unfrequently conveyed him to visit the regions of the skies. On one of these occasions he incurred the displeasure of Tilottamá, a nymph of paradise, and she denounced an imprecation on his future fortune, sentencing him to the pangs of separation from his beloved. Sahasránika was married to Mṛigavatí, daughter of Kṛipavarmá, King of Oude. During her pregnancy she was seized with a strange fancy, inspired, in fact, by the influence of the imprecation, to bathe in human blood. When the king found compliance with her longing was unavoidable, he deceived her by substituting an infusion of the lac-dye, in which the queen contentedly performed her ablutions. The crimson tint left upon her person by the effect of the immersion, deceived one of the gigantic brood of Garuḍa², as he pursued his flight through

² This is the Roc, or Rokh, of Arabian romance, agreeing in the multiplicity of the individuals, as well as their propensity for the air. Thinking her to be a lump of flesh, he pounced upon the queen, and carried her off to the mountain Udaya, where, finding her alive, he abandoned her to her destiny, having thus been the unconscious instrument of separating Sahasránsika from his bride.

In this helpless condition the queen, overcome with terror and affliction, sought alone for death to terminate her distress. With this view she threw herself in the way of the wild elephants and the vast serpents, with which the thickets were peopled; but in vāin—an unseen spirit of the air protected her, and guided her unharmed amidst the ferocious monsters of the forest, until she was encountered by a holy hermit, Jamadagni, who resided on the mountain, and who led her to his cell, where he consoled her with assurances, that she would in time be re-united to her lord. Mṛigavatī was here delivered of a son, whom, in allusion to the place of his nativity, she named raw meat. (See Sindbad's Voyages [ed. Langlès, p. 149.]) The latter characteristic, to the utter subversion of all poetical fancies, has acquired, it may be supposed, for the Adjutant (Ardea Argila) the name of Garudā. A wundervogel, or wonderful bird, is the property of all people; and the Garudā of the Hindus is represented by the Eorosh of the Zend, Simoorgh of the Persians, the Anka of the Arabs, the Kerkes of the Turks, the Kirni of the Japanese, the sacred dragon of the Chinese, the Griffin of Chivalry, the Phoenix of classical fable, the wise and ancient bird that sits upon the ash Yggdrasil of the Edda, and, according to Faber, in common with all the rest, is a misrepresentation of the holy cherubim that guarded the gate of paradise. Some writers have even traced the twelve knights of the round Table to the twelve Rocs of Persian story.

Udayana, and who was trained in letters and arms, and in the duties of his regal birth, by his venerable guardian.

When Udayana grew up, he rambled fearlessly through the forest, and on one occasion beheld a mountaineer catch a snake. The boy, in pity for the captive animal, requested the barbarian to liberate him; but the man stated, that he subsisted by snaring and exhibiting serpents, and that to part with his prize would injure himself. Udayana then offered him a golden bracelet for his expectations, for which equivalent the mountaineer relinquished the snake, and departed, well pleased with his bargain. As soon

—— “Let none admire

That riches grow in hell—that soil may best

Deserve the precious bane.”

Connected with this notion is the popular superstition of the Hindus, that hidden treasures are often indicated by the haunts of particular serpents. [Grimm, deutsche Mythologie. 1844, p. 648 ff. Mannhardt, german. Mythen. Berlin: 1858, p. 148 ff. Schwarz, Ursprung der Mythologie. Berlin: 1860, p. 42 ff. Wolf, *Beiträge zur d. Faber has noticed some of the circumstances. The Nāgas of the Hindus, however, appear an inoffensive race. [Troyer ad Rājataranginī, Vol. II, p. 457–64.] They took refuge in Pátála, to escape from the destructive hostility of Garuda. They often mix with mortals, but rarely, if ever, for malignant purposes. We shall have occasion to recur to their history.

as he was gone, the snake, assuming a human shape, addressed Udayana, and told him he was the Vasunemi, the elder brother of Vásuki, the sovereign of the serpent tribes of Pátála¹. He begged the young prince to accompany him to his palace, and Udayana readily assented; when, in requital of the service rendered to Vasunemi, both he and his brother loaded Udayana with the most precious and curious gems, presenting him, amongst other valuable gifts, with a lute of celestial manufacture—after which they reconveyed Udayana to the abode of his preceptor. In the mean time the mountaineer descended to the plains to dispose of the bracelet, and speedily met with the tents of Sahasráńka, who was traversing the world in search of his queen. The bracelet had been given to Udayana by his mother, who, to amuse her sorrows, had engraved the name of her husband on its inner surface. The inscription caught the eye of the persons to whom it was offered, and they conducted the barbarian to the king, to account for its possession. When Sahasráńka heard his story, he was transported with the hope of beholding his queen and son, and commanded the forester to conduct him and his train to the mountain without delay. The man obeyed, and they found themselves shortly at the hermitage of Jamadagni, where Mṛigavatí and her son were restored to the embraces of the delighted king. They returned together to Kauśámbí. When Udayana had reached adolescence, his father resigned the sovereign authority into his hands, and returned with his consort to the Himála mountains, to terminate their days in solitude and devotion.

The young prince of Kausámbi, ascending the throne in a period of peace and prosperity, had little other occupation than his pleasures. Reposing the cares of state upon his trusty minister Yogandharáyana, he spent much of his time in the forest engaged in the chase, which he followed, armed with the lute presented him by the serpent monarch, whose dulcet notes attracted and tamed the most ferocious elephants. At this period Chandásena was king of Ujjayiní. He had a daughter named Vásavadattá, of such singular beauty and accomplishments, that her father held all the princes of the earth unworthy of her hand, except the young monarch of Kausámbi: at the same time their union was not easily to be effected, as the two kings were politically enemies of each other, and the sovereign of Ujjayiní determined therefore to have recourse to stratagem.

With this view he sent an ambassador to Vatsa, to say, that having heard of his musical proficiency, he was desirous of securing him as his daughter's preceptor, and would be happy to see that monarch accordingly at Ujjayiní. Vatsa heard this affronting message with great indignation, but suppressed his resentment till he had consulted his minister. Yogandharayana availed himself of the opportunity to give some salutary admonition to the young prince. He observed that he had drawn this affront upon himself,—that his addiction to frivolous pursuits was evidently noised abroad, and that indignity was the bitter fruit of an indifferent reputation—that it was clear the king of Ujjayiní, trusting to the attractions of his daughter, purposed merely to get him into his power, when he would hold him captive, and seize his dominions—and that dissipation was a snare, by which princes were entangled, as elephants were caught in pits, covered over with seeming verdure. After receiving these lessons, Vatsa returned to the hall of audience, and calling the envoy from Ujjayiní before him, desired him to return to his master, and inform him, that if he were anxious his daughter should receive any instructions from Vatsa, he must send her to Kauśámbí. With this retort the ambassador was dismissed.

Upon the departure of the messenger, Vatsa called a council of his ministers, and announced to them his intention of marching against Ujjayiní, and seizing the person of its king. From this his counsellors dissuaded him, and none more earnestly than Yogandharáyāna. Chañdasena, he urged, was a prince of great prowess and prudence, and one not easily overcome; in proof of which he related his adventures.

Story of Chañdasena, King of Ujjayiní.

The city of Ujjayiní is the ornament of the earth, and with its white palaces derides the capital of Indra: for the agreeableness of whose site the Lord of the universe, in his actual presence as Mahákála¹, disdains the summits of Kailása². Mahendravarma was king of this city: his son was Jayasena, and his son was Mahásena. This last prince obtained in his youth a sword of celestial temper, through his propitiation of the goddess Chañdí; from which circumstance, and his own fiery disposition, he derived the appellation of Chañdamahásena, or Chañdasena.

By direction of his tutelary goddess, Chañdasena set off in quest of a suitable bride, none of the daughters of his brother kings being worthy, in his own estimation, of the honour of his alliance. Having pursued his way for a considerable distance through the shades of an extensive forest, he encountered a wild boar of gigantic stature, and as black as night. The king drew his bow, and struck him repeatedly with his shafts, but in vain. The animal was invulnerable. Leaping from his car, the prince prepared to assault him with his scymitar; but the monster fled from before him, and plunged into a yawning cavern. The king pursued him. After penetrating some distance, a blaze of light burst suddenly upon him, and he found himself in front of a splendid palace, on the lawn before which was a spacious reservoir of water.

Whilst Chañdasena was meditating on this strange discovery, a bevy of beauteous damsels approached him, conducted by a nymph of exquisite loveliness, who courteously enquired the purpose of his coming. He related to her the occurrences of the forest, and in return begged her to gratify his curiosity by informing him whither accident had led him. Whilst the tear-drop started from her large and lucid eye, the nymph replied:—

“You have been conducted, prince, by your evil destiny to the residence of my father. My name is Angáravatí: my sire is Angáraka, a Daitya, formidable to the gods, and endowed with a frame of adamant, impervious to hostile weapons. The effect of an imprecation denounced upon him compels him to assume at times the condition of a fiend who preys upon mankind, when, in the form of a beast of the forest, he roams the thickets, and overpowers or ensnares the traveller. Fatigued with to-day’s encounter, and secure in imagination of his victim, he now reposes: when he wakes, your destruction is unavoidable.” Saying which, the damsel expressed the interest she took in the fate of the king.

Chāṇḍasena having thanked the nymph for the sympathy she displayed, and declared the impression she had made upon his heart, told her to endeavour to ascertain whether her sire was every where alike impenetrable, and directed her how to obtain the secret. Going to Angáraka, therefore, she was found by him, when he woke, seemingly immersed in deep affliction. He asked the cause; to which she answered, she feared for his life; and should any mischance occur—should he fall by any hostile hand, what was to become of her? He told her to dismiss her apprehensions, as he incurred no peril. The whole of his skin was of adamant, the only vulnerable part being the palm of his left hand:—a wound there indeed would be fatal; but as it was employed in grasping the bow, it was consequently never exposed.” This was overheard by Chañdasena, who had been covertly stationed by Angáravatí, where he might listen to what passed between her sire and her.

Having risen from his couch, the Titan went forth to bathe, and address his prayers to Hara. Whilst engaged in their silent repetition, the king appeared, and challenged him to combat. Angáraka, unwilling to break off his devotion, or to interrupt his inaudible prayer, waved to the king with his left hand to wait for a short period. Chañdasena seized the opportunity, and, whilst the palm of the hand was turned towards him, let fly a shaft, which pierced the vital spot, and the Daitya instantly fell to the ground. As he breathed his last, he murmured, “Let my conqueror offer daily libations to my spirit, if he hope to retain imperial sway.”

After the fall of Angáraka, Chañdasena married Angáravatí, and returned to Ujjayiní, where he continued to reign with uninterrupted prosperity. He had two sons by his queen, Bhúpálaka and Pálaka, and one daughter, Vāsavadattá, so named because she was the gift of Indra, (or Vāsava,) the deity having appeared in a dream to the prince, and announced her birth as the recompence of the magnificence with which the king had celebrated his festival. Thus favoured by the gods, and formidable in his own prowess and political resources, the monarchs of the earth must be careful how they provoke the resentment of Chañdasena.

Story of Vatsa—resumed.

When the messenger of Chañdasena returned to his master with Vatsa's reply, the king of Ujjayiní secretly pleased with the young prince's spirit, was only the more bent upon securing him for a son-in-law. With this purpose he had recourse to stratagem, and caused an elephant, the exact similitude of a celebrated animal in his possession, to be constructed by able artists. This he privately sent into the forests, where he knew Vatsa was accustomed to hunt, and left it there, filling the interior cavity with a party of armed men¹.

Includunt cœco lateri penitusque cavernas Ingentes uterumque armato milite complent."

— Virgil [Aen. II, 18.]

—"In the hollow side
Selected numbers of their chiefs they hide;
With inward arms the dire machine they load,
And iron bowels stuff the dark abode."

Dryden.

The conception was, however, as old as Homer at least.

"Ἰππῳ ἐνὶ ξυστῶ ἔν' ἐνήμεθα πάντες ἄριστοι
Ἀργείων, Τρωέσσι φόρον καὶ κῆρα φέροντες.
Od. 4. 278.

In a few days the prince of Kauśámbí, resuming his usual habits, repaired to the Vindhya woods. His scouts, observing the artificial elephant at a distance, mistook it for a living animal, and carried the news to their master. Eager to seize so stately a captive, Vatsa advanced towards the elephant, in no degree surprised by its tranquillity, which he attributed to the effects of his magical lute, whose cords he struck as he approached slowly and alone, accompanying the sound with the sweetness of his voice. When he was close to the figure, the armed men sprang from their concealment. Vatsa struck the foremost to the ground; but he was presently surrounded, and resistance rendered vain. They hurried him off; and, being protected by strong parties stationed along the road, conveyed their prisoner in triumph to Ujjayiní.

On Vatsa's entering Ujjayiní, the people who had collected in crowds to see him were so much prepossessed by his blooming countenance and graceful deportment, that they exclaimed with one voice: "Vatsa must not be put to death; keep him, but kill him not:" and Chañdasena, in order to allay the tumult, was obliged to promise them his prisoner's personal security.

"When in the finished horse, the best of Greece

And again, in the 8th Book. The story was told over and over again, before it got to Virgil; and therefore Heyne concludes: "Habebat poeta fabulam a multis tractatam et vulgarem ante se positam." Whether any of these earlier tales came from, or wandered to the east, can scarcely receive any illustration from what is here probably only an accidental coincidence.

The king of Ujjayiní next delivered Vatsa to his daughter, as her preceptor in musical science. He told the prince, that if he would render Vāsavadattá a proficient, he had nothing to apprehend, but might expect an equivalent reward. And Vatsa, as soon as he beheld the beauty of the princess, felt not a whit reluctant to undertake her tuition. She was equally well contented with her master, and gave up all her thoughts to him; for though modesty may check the eye, the heart is beyond control. Thence many delightful hours were passed by both in the musical saloon, as Vatsa, with his lute suspended from his neck, gave utterance to the impassioned notes, that were re-echoed by his fair pupil, as she stood in all her loveliness before him.

When the news of Vatsa's capture reached Kauśámbí, the people, inflamed with resentment, urged an immediate invasion of the territories of Ujjayiní. The wisdom of the ministers, however, afraid to contend openly with the power of Chaṇdásena, allayed the ferment, and they engaged to rescue their prince by less hazardous means. Yogandharáyāna undertook to effect his liberation in person, and set out, accompanied by Vasantaka, for Ujjayiní, leaving to Rumañwán¹ the charge of Kauśámbí.

¹ Wherever the king of Vatsa is the hero of the history, these three are part of the dramatis personæ. Yogandharáyāna, as chief minister, possessing also magical power, unites the character of Turpin and Merlin. Vasantaka is a sort of buffo, as well as a

On his way through the Vindhyan thickets, vast as his experience, and intricate as his policy, Yogandharáyaña paid a visit to the chief of the forest tribes. The king of the Pulindas¹ was an ancient ally of Kauśámbí; and, by desire of the minister, he prepared his bands to cover the escape of Vatsa, as he should return through the woods. This arrangement being effected, the minister resumed his route to Ujjayiní. He halted on the funereal ground without the city, where, employing his magic skill, he transformed himself to the semblance of a decrepid and crazed old man, and minister, and the personal friend of the prince; and Rumañwán is the general, or commander in chief.

his companion Vasantaka to a figure of singular and ridiculous deformity. Thus disguised, they entered the city severally by different gates. Yogandharáyāna made direct for the palace, attracting and diverting the mob by his songs and gesticulations. The servants of the princess joining the throng, and amused by the antics of the supposed idiot, reported his entertaining gambols to their mistress, and excited her curiosity to witness them. Accordingly, by her command, the disguised Yogandharáyāna was introduced into the presence of Vāsavadattá, and there beheld his master in bonds. Having contrived, by a private signal, to let Vatsa know him, he suddenly became invisible to the court, and the attendants questioned each other with astonishment what had become of the antic. The princess was no less surprised; and Vatsa, availing himself of the general feeling to get rid of all spectators, recommended to Vāsavadattá to go and offer propitiatory devotions at the shrine of Saraswatí. The princess and her train departed for that purpose, and left Vatsa alone with his friend.

Having thus obtained an opportunity of communicating with the prince, Yogandharáyāna imparted to him the plan he had devised for his escape; and finding that his master was resolved not to leave Ujjayini without the princess, now comprised her in the plot. Having imparted to Vatsa the means of extricating himself from his chains, and desired him to admit Vasantaka, when he arrived, to his councils, he departed to superintend the arrangements of the retreat.

When the princess returned from the temple, Vasantaka presented himself at the palace gate, and at the instance of Vatsa was invited to enter. His deformities excited the mirth and compassion of Vāsava-dattá, and she desired him to remain in the palace, promising that he should be taken care of. On her further asking him whether he possessed any learning, he said, he was deeply read in story-telling, and gave her the following proof of his talent.

Story of Lohajangha.

In Mathurá dwelt a public dancer, named Rūpa-ñiká, of great beauty and accomplishments. Her charms attracted universal admiration; and many advantageous proposals were made to her. To the great vexation of her mother, however, she treated all her suitors with disdain, and fixed her undivided affections upon a young and indigent Brahman, named Lohajangha, whom she had met at a public festival in one of the many temples, which decorate the birthplace of Kṛishná.

Finding that remonstrances were unavailing, the old woman determined to have recourse to other means, and to get rid of the obnoxious lover by violence. For this object she had Lohajangha waylaid by bravoos, and so unmercifully beaten, that he scarce escaped with life. He got away, however, from his assailants, and fled to the neighbouring forests, where, still doubtful of his security, he was rejoiced to creep into an elephant's hide, which had been completely hollowed out by jackals, so that the skin alone remained. The effect of his bruises, and the cold breeze, lulled him to sleep; but he was speedily awakened by fresh misadventures. A tremendous fall of rain came on, and the river, overpassing its boundaries, swept through the forest, and carried the hide and its inhabitant along with it in its course. Whilst floating down the stream, a bird of Garuḍa's breed, perceiving it, darted on the skin, and bore it in his beak across the main to Lanká. Here alighting, he prepared to gorge upon his prize, when Lohajangha making his appearance, frightened the animal, and put him to flight.

Lohajangha looking round him, and observing the ocean, rubbed his eyes, and fancied he was in a dream. To add to his apprehensions, two Rákhasas of hideous aspect presented themselves at some distance; but, luckily for him, they were no less alarmed than himself. They still recollected the humiliation their race had sustained from mortal prowess, and dreaded another Ráma in the individual they beheld. One of them set off forthwith to Vibhíshaṇa, to announce the event to the prince¹, who, partaking the sentiments of his followers, desired the Rákshasa to go immediately, and with all possible respect invite the man to his palace.

When the Rákshasa returned to Lohajangha, and conveyed to him his monarch's message, apprising him at the same time into whose hands he had fallen, the courage of Lohajangha revived, and he determined to turn his visit to good account. Repairing, therefore, to Vibhíshaña, he told the Rákshasa chief that he was a Brahman of Mathurá; that, being in extreme indigence, he had applied for succour to Vishnú; and that the deity had instructed him to go to Lanká, where Vibhíshaña, his faithful votary, would gladly relieve the distress of one who was equally attached to his worship. Lohajangha added, that he had enquired who Vibhíshaña was, and where he was to be found; on which he was told not to take any trouble upon the subject; and accordingly, having gone to sleep as usual, he found himself, when he awoke, on the sea coast of Lanká.

Vibhíshaña, knowing that Lanká was accessible by Lanká and Ceylon, conceiving the former invisible, or inaccessible to mortals. It is rather singular that the traditions of Rávaña and Ráma seem unknown on the island, or at least that they are not locally applied. The only mention, indeed, of Rávaña that occurs, is in the history of Ceylon, published in the Annals of Oriental Literature; and he is there made a prince of the mainland. "The demon Rávaña governed the country between Tutacoreen and Ceylon." The traditions of the south also extend the dominion of Rávaña to the Terra Firma, and make Trichinapali one of his frontier fortresses.

no ordinary means, was induced, by the mere fact of Lohajangha's presence, to credit his story, and accordingly sent his emissaries to bring treasure from the mountain with the golden base. He gave him also a young bird of the Garuḍa breed to convey him back to Mathurá, instructing him how to manage the animal. Lohajangha, in the mean while, spent his time agreeably in conversation with Vibhíshaṇa, who related to him this legend, explaining how it chanced that Lanká was made of wood.

Origin of Lanká.

Desirous of liberating his mother from the state of servitude to the parent of the Nágas, and to pay the fixed price of her liberation, the ambrosia of the immortals, Garuḍa prepared to carry off the celestial beverage by fraud or force¹. To collect sufficient strength for his enterprize, he applied to his father Kaśyapa for invigorating food. The seer directed him to go to the ocean, where he would find a large elephant and tor-

¹ Kadrú, the mother of the serpents, and Vinatá, the mother of Garuḍa, both wives of Kaśyapa, disputed about the colour of the horses of the sun. They agreed to decide by a bet—an ancient custom, it should seem; and the loser was to become the bondswoman of the winner. Vinatá, the mother of Garuḍa, lost the wager, and her liberty: but Kadrú agreed to give her her manumission, if her son would procure the amrita, the beverage of immortality, for the benefit of her own ophitic progeny. This is the legend alluded to in the text. [Mahābh. I, ch. 16 ff. Weber, Ind. Studien, I, 224, Note.]

toise, whom he might seize and devour. Garuḍa did as he was instructed, and after his meal rested on a branch of the Kalpa tree, or tree of heaven. The branch gave way with his weight. In fear of its falling upon the holy Bálakhilyas¹, who prosecuted their devotions at the foot of the tree, he laid hold of it, and bore it away with his beak. Kaśyapa, out of regard to the security of mankind, commanded Garuḍa to carry it to some lonely spot, where he might let it fall without doing mischief. He accordingly deposited it on the ocean, and it served as a base, on which the wooden fabric of the island was subsequently reared².

Story of Lohajangha—concluded.

After this, Lohajangha, being well laden with gold and gems, mounted his now docile bird, and returned with the speed of thought to Mathurá, carrying also a golden club, shell, and discus, as presents from Vi-and not improbably connected, as supposed by the writer in the Quarterly Review No. XLI, with the character of Dāumling, Thaumlin; Tamlane, Tom-a-lyn, or Tom Thumb. [Vishnú Pur. p. 83.]

² This legend, absurd as it is, is rather of a curious character, especially as it differs from the Paurāṇik story. According to a supplement to the Rámáyāṇa, Lanká was made of gold by Viśwakarmá, for the especial residence of Kuvera, from whom it was taken by Rávaṇa.

bhīṣhaṇa to the shrine of Viṣṇu. He alighted in a deserted temple without the city, and there concealed his treasures, and fastened his bird: taking one of the jewels, he sold it in the market, and with the price bought food, clothes, and ornaments. He then returned to his hiding-place, and at night, mounting his winged steed, he repaired to the dwelling of his mistress. Having been received by her with joyful recognition, he taught her how to play her part to be revenged on the cause of their separation, and then returned to his concealment.

In the morning, Rūpaṇikā kept herself in her apartment, and assumed a mysterious silence. She would only speak with her mother*, after causing a screen to be drawn between them; and then condescended to tell her, that she was the bride of Viṣṇu, and could not commune any more with mere mortals. To remove the old woman's doubts, she told her to keep watch at night, in consequence of which she beheld the pretended Viṣṇu arrive with the emblems, and mounted on the vehicle of the god. Entertaining no further doubt, she requested her daughter to impart to her some of the benefits of such exalted visitation.

The reply to the request of Makaradanshtrā was to this effect. She was told she was too wicked to be admissible into Swarga in her own person; but that on the early morning of every eleventh day of the fortnight, the gates of Indra's heaven were set open to all comers. At this time the followers of Śambhu passed in and out in bands, and if she could get amongst the crowd, she might perhaps pass in unobserved. For this purpose it would be necessary for her to disguise herself like them, by tying her hair in five tresses, hanging a string of bones round her neck, throwing off all her attire, and smearing one side with lamp black, and the other with vermillion¹. The old woman assented to these conditions, and at the appointed time Lohajangha carried her off on his bird. He had observed in the front of a temple a tall pillar, surmounted by a stone ring, or wheel; and here he lodged her as the banner of his retaliation: here she remained throughout the night, suspecting she was tricked, dreading discovery, and with difficulty maintaining her station². The morning had scarcely dawned, when she was recognised by the people, and young and old assembled in crowds, enjoying her mishap, and laughing heartily at her ridiculous appearance: at length Rūpañiká came to her aid, and had her carried home. The prince of Mathurá offered a reward to the individual whose ingenuity had devised the frolic; and Lohajangha, coming forward, related his story, to the entertainment and astonishment of the people and their lord. With the approbation of the latter, Lohajangha was married to Rúpañiká, and they passed their days in affluence and pleasure¹.

Story of Vatsa—resumed.

In the course of a short time, the affections of Vá-savadattá were so firmly fixed on Vatsa, that country and parents were light in the comparison. Yogandharáyaña now reappeared, to announce that every thing was prepared for their flight, and the keeper of Vá-

¹ The bold assumption of a masquerade character of divinity is probably borrowed from practices not unknown to the Hindus, although more rare than with the Babylonians, Lycians, and Egyptians, when the priest pretended

And that he trod

Milman's Belshazzar.

As a fable, the mortal personation of Vishnú is similarly related in the Pancha Tantra [I, 5]; only instead of a real bird, the lover rides an artificial one, the prototype of the “wondrous horse of brass”, the flying steed of Rugiero, and other marvellous fabrications familiar to romance, more closely imitated, in object as well as structure, however, in the Labourer and Flying Car of the additional tales of the Arabian Nights, and in Málek and Shirín, in the Persian Tales. savadattá's elephant, a beast of unequalled velocity, bribed to lend them aid. He therefore desired Vatsa to prevail on the princess to accompany him, and thus retaliate on Chañḍasena the trick he had practised, not doubting that he would subsequently assent with joy to their espousal. The minister then departed to give notice to the forest monarch. Vatsa repaired to the princess. It needed little eloquence to persuade her to a measure to which she was so well inclined, and her concurrence was readily obtained. Accordingly, when night came, Vāsavadattá, with a confidential attendant, and Vatsa, with his friend Vasantaka, mounted the elephant, and set forth on their flight. They took their way out of the city by a part of the wall that was broken down, Vatsa having been compelled to engage and slay the two soldiers who were stationed at the post. They then got clear of Ujjayiní, and plunged into the adjacent woods.

Flight of Vatsa.

Vatsa continued his journey with unrelaxed speed, and by noon the following day reached the Vindhya forests, a distance of sixty-three yojanas¹. Here his elephant was so overcome with fatigue and thirst, that the prince and his companions alighted to relieve her. Seeing a pool, she hastened to drink; and the effect of the draught, whilst thus heated, was presently fatal. She fell, and expired. Vatsa was thus compelled to pursue his journey on foot. On entering the forest, he was attacked by a party of robbers; but maintained a conflict with them, until fortunately the chief of the Pulindas, on the watch for his return, came to his rescue, and conducted him and his attendants in safety to his village. On the following morning Rumañwán, the general, arrived with a strong force; and Vatsa, now in security, continued to occupy the forest, until he received intelligence from Ujjayiní of the events cos is variously computed, it will be equal to $4\frac{1}{2}$, 5, or 9 miles. We need not estimate it in either case by the powers of the elephant, for they were supernatural; but it may furnish some clue to the actual situation of Kauśámbí. Kauśámbí was on the Ganges. Its dependencies bordered on Magadha, the northernmost boundaries of which extended to Chúnar. At five miles to the yojana, its frontier began 315 miles from Ougein. This was some short distance, say five miles, from the Palli, or station of the forest chief; and it will hereafter appear, that the latter was at a distance of a day's march from the capital for cavalry. Allowing, therefore, 30 miles for this, Kauśámbí was on the Ganges, not far from Chúnar, about 350 miles from Ougein. There can be no doubt, therefore, that it was in, or about, the lower part of the Doáb, which is not above 380 miles from Ougein, and sufficiently near to Magadha. These circumstances confirm the opinions stated in a former note, that the site of Kauśámbí is to be sought in the vicinity of Kurrah; though it is rather singular, in that case, that no mention is made of the Jamná, which Vatsa should have crossed in his return to his capital.

Story of Guhasena and his Wife Devasmitá.

In the city of Támraliptí¹ dwelt a wealthy banker, named Dharmadatta. He was unhappy in the midst of his riches that he had no child to inherit them, and he applied to the Brahmans to obtain a son. To propitiate their favour, he celebrated the Homa, or sacrifice to fire, and distributed amongst them presents of great value. The consequence of his devotion was the birth of an heir, whom he named Guhasena.

When Guhasena approached manhood, his father carried him along with him in his mercantile expeditions, both to initiate him into the mysteries of trade, and procure him a suitable bride. With this last intention he applied to Dharmagupta, an opulent merchant of the island Katáha; but he was unwilling to give his daughter to one, who resided so far away as in Támraliptí, and on this account declined the alliance. His daughter, however, was of a different opinion. Having seen Guhasena, she was disposed to relinquish home and friends for his sake, and contrived, with the intermediation of a friend, to apprise him of her sentiments. He was equally ready to avail himself of her good wishes, and accordingly carried her off privately to Tāmraliptī, where they were married, and continued to reside happy in the unvarying attachment of each other.

After a time the father of Guhasena died, and it was necessary that he should visit foreign countries, in order to look after the mercantile concerns, that had now devolved on his sole care. His wife, however, would not hear of his leaving her, apprehending not only the perils of travel, but her husband's becoming attached to some other woman in her absence. It was in vain that he vowed the most unalterable fidelity, and undeviating affection. She was not to be persuaded; and between the violence of her opposition and the urgency of his affairs Guhasena was utterly at a loss what conduct to adopt.

In this dilemma he had recourse to the gods; and having fasted and prayed in the temple of Śiva, returned sorrowfully home. His appeal, however, was not in vain, and at night the deity appeared to Guhasena and his wife, presenting either with a red lotus, which would lose its colour and freshness, he said, only, if one of them in absence should prove inconstant¹. On their waking they found the flowers; and not omitted. Thus in Perce Forest, it is a rose which, borne by a wife or maid of irreproachable virtue, preserves its freshness, and fades if the wearer is unchaste. In Amadis de Gaul, it is a garland, which blooms on the head of her that is faithful, and fades on the brow of the inconstant. In Les Contes à rire, it is also a flower. In Ariosto, the test applied to both male and female is a cup, the wine of which is spilled by the unfaithful lover. This fiction also occurs in the romances of Tristan, Perceval, and La Morte d'Arthur, and is well known by La Fontaine's version, La Coupe Enchantée. In La Lai du Corn, it is a drinking-horn. Spencer has derived his girdle of Florimel from these sources, or more immediately from the Fabliau, Le Manteau mal Taillé [Le-grand I, 126], or Le Court Mantel, an English version of which is published in Percy's Reliques, the Boy and the Mantel, (Vol. III.) In the Gesta Romanorum [c. 69.], the test is the whimsical one of a shirt, which will neither require washing nor mending, as long as the wearer is constant. [See the literature ap. Grässe, Sagenkreise des Mittelalters, p. 185 ff.] Davenant has substituted an emerald for a flower.

—“The bridal stone,
And much renowned, because it chasteness loves,
And will, when worn by the neglected wife,
Shew when her absent lord disloyal proves,
By faintness, and a pale decay of life.”

Gondibert, Canto IV.

The miraculous properties of stones are of eastern origin, although we do not find in the Sanskrit or Arabic account of the emerald the property which Davenant has assigned it, unless he has fabricated a poetical notion from the story of the Arabs derived from the Greeks, that this stone and jasper facilitate parturition.

“Λέγονται δὲ πάντες εἶναι γυλακτῆρες, περιάπτα καὶ ὠκυτώκια μηρῶν περιεπιτόμενα.”—Dioscor.

Guhasena, having arrived at the island of Katáha, proceeded to dispatch his affairs, and to traffic in the sale of jewels. Having, in the course of these transactions, formed an intimacy with four young merchants, they noticed the lotus, which was frequently in his hand, and yet never faded, and were curious to learn its history. As he appeared reluctant to gratify their curiosity, they had recourse to stratagem, and invited him to an entertainment, at which they plied him with wine till he became intoxicated, and then acquainted them in his cups with the properties of the flower. The story only tended to make them anxious to know the object of Guhasena's affections; and relying upon his being detained some time at Katáha, they shortly afterwards embarked for Támraliptí, with a determination to subvert the fidelity of his wife.

On arriving at Támraliptí, they looked out for a proper agent of their iniquitous design, and soon found one in the person of an old Bauddha priestess, though for a different purpose. Titania gives her three attendants a rose each from her garland; and when they lose their colour, it is to indicate her reconciliation with Oberon.

"Thut wie ich euch gesagt, und alle Tag' und Stunden Schaute eure Rosen an, und wenn ihr alle drey
Zu Lilien werden seht, so merket dran ich sey
Mit Oberon versöhnt und wieder neu verbunden."

"Observe then my commands, and every day and hour,
With care behold each rose, and when it changes hue,
And like a lily pines, be sure that with the power
Of Elfinland appeased, my union I renew."

Canto IX, 35.

named Yogakarañdiká, with whom they formed an intimacy. Being secure of her friendly disposition, they communicated their purpose, and promised to reward her liberally, if she would assist them in their views on Devasmitá. She very readily promised to aid them, but declined their reward, as, thanks to her pupils, she was, she said, sufficiently wealthy; and her services were at their command, in requital of the civility with which they had treated her.

Accordingly the old priestess set about forming an acquaintance with Devasmitá, and, leading with her a bitch in a chain, repaired to her house. The wife of Guhasena, although mistrustful of her mission, desired her to be admitted, and enquired what she wanted. The old priestess replied, that she had been long desirous of beholding so much excellence; but that she had now been directed in a dream to visit Devasmitá, and to advise her not to lose in joyless widowhood the precious moments of her youth. Devasmitá pretended to listen favourably to these and similar suggestions, and the old woman departed, well satisfied with the impression she had made.

On the day following, she repeated her visit to the wife of Guhasena, taking with her the bitch as before, and some morsels of meat highly seasoned. These she contrived to give the animal, till from the effects of the pepper the tears trickled in large quantities from her eyes, so as to attract the notice of Devasmitá. She bewails, said the woman, in answer to her remarks, the errors of her former life; and then told her that the bitch and she were, in their former existence, the joint wives of a Brahman, who was frequently employed on foreign missions by the king of the country. That during his absence she had never imposed any restraint upon her inclinations; but her companion had been more rigid, and had severely repressed the natural sentiments of her age and sex. The consequence of their different line of conduct was their respective births in the characters in which they now appeared, together with the recollection of their former existence. The old woman concluded by recommending Devasmitá to take warning from the story, and to learn that nature was not to be outraged with impunity¹.

¹ This incident, with a very different, and much less moral denouement, is one of the stories of the Disciplina Clericalis [XIV, see the notes in F. W. V. Schmidt's edition, p. 129-34.], a collection of stories professedly derived from the Arabian fabulists, and compiled by Petrus Alfonsus, a converted Jew, who flourished about 1106, and was godson to Alfonso I. king of Aragon. In the analysis prepared by Mr. Douce, this story is the 12th, and is entitled, "Stratagem of an old woman in favour of a young gallant." She persuades his mistress, who had rejected his addresses, that her little dog was formerly a woman, and so transformed in consequence of her cruelty to her lover. (Ellis's Metrical Romances, I, 180.) This story was introduced into Europe, therefore, much about the period at which it was enrolled amongst the contents of the Vīḥat Kathā in Cashmir. The metempsychosis is so much more obvious an explanation of the change of forms, that it renders it probable the story was originally Hindu. It was soon copied in Europe, and occurs in Le Grand as La vieille qui seduisit la jeune fille, III, 148. [ed. III, Vol. IV, 50.] The parallel is very close, and the old woman gives "une chienne à manger des

Devasmitá, who well knew the drift of the old woman's narration, pretended to give it implicit belief, and encouraged her to propose the introduction of the lovers. A ready assent was given to the proposal; and whilst the priestess departed to announce her success to them, Devasmitá prepared for their reception. The first who arrived was welcomed with great seeming cordiality, and invited to partake of a banquet, in which he was liberally plied with wine, into which some Datura powder had been infused. The drug quickly deprived him of consciousness, on which the servants of Devasmitá stripped him, branded his forehead with the mark of a dog's foot, and turned him choses fortement saupoudrées de senève qui lui picotait le palais et les narines, et l'animal larmoyait beaucoup." She then shews her to the young woman, and tells her the bitch was her daughter, "Son malheur fut d'avoir le cœur dur; un jeune homme l'aimait, elle le rebuta. Le malheureux après avoir tout tenté pour l'attendrir, désespéré de sa dureté, en prit tant de chagrin qu'il tomba malade et mourut. Dieu l'a bien vengé; voyez en quel état pour la punir il a réduit ma pauvre fille, et comment elle pleure sa faute." The lesson is not thrown away. The story occurs also in the Gesta Romanorum [c. 28, ed. Swan, I, 120 & 347; ed. Grässe, I, 54. II, 259], as "The old Woman and her little Dog;" and it also holds a place where we should scarcely have expected to find it, in the Promptuarium of John Herolt of Basil, an ample repository of examples for composing sermons: the compiler, a Dominican friar, professing to imitate his patron saint, who always abundabat exemplis in his discourses. [Comp: on the literature and history of this story: Th. Wright, Latin Stories. London: 1842, p. 218. Loiseleur Deslongchamps, Essai sur les Fables Indiennes. Paris: 1838, p. 106 ff. F. into a foul drain, where he lay till morning. Waking before dawn, and finding himself in a miserable plight, he hastened to conceal his disgrace in his dwelling; and being ashamed to acknowledge what had befallen him, and determined that his companions should have no reason to laugh at him, he said not a word about his treatment, but pretended he had been robbed and beaten by a set of thieves. Accordingly, his fellow travellers in succession were introduced to Devasmitá, and shared a like reception, losing their clothes and ornaments, and bearing away nothing but the indelible mark of their ignominy. They were sensible, however, that they had only met with their deserts, and could expect no redress; and they accordingly determined to set off quietly, and return at once to their country, without acquainting their ancient counsellor with their mishap, or remunerating her for her share in their discomfiture and disgrace.

After she was thus rid of her suitors, Devasmitá communicated the story to her mother-in-law, who highly approved of her conduct, but expressed some apprehension that Guhasena might suffer from the resentment of the traders, when they had returned home. Devasmitá, however, bid her be of good cheer; for she was determined to anticipate their devices, and to display as much devotion to her husband as was shewn by their countrywoman Śaktimati.

Story of Śaktimati.

In the island of Katáha was a temple dedicated to the great Yaksha, named Mañibhadra, whose shrine was much frequented by the people, as he was supposed to grant whatever his worshippers requested. Offenders against law or decorum, taken by the police during the night, were locked up in this temple. In the morning they were brought before the king; and if proved guilty, the offence was made public, and they were taken away by the ministers of justice.

It so happened, that the husband of Śaktimatī, being detected in an improper intercourse with the wife of another merchant, was carried off with the adulteress, and imprisoned in the temple as usual. When Śaktimatī heard the news, she forgot every thing but her husband's danger, and determined to attempt his release. With this purpose she proceeded at night to the temple with her attendants, and pretended extreme urgency to offer her homage to Mañibhadra. The priests, afraid of losing a valuable contribution, were prevailed upon to give her admittance, and she was allowed to enter the temple alone. Having discovered herself to the culprits, she exchanged clothes with the partner of her husband's offence, and took her place in the prison¹. In the morning, when the parties were brought before the king, and the merchant and Śaktimatī were recognised as man and wife,

Story of Devasmitá—concluded.

Being equally determined to extricate her husband from all possible peril, Devasmitá disguised herself and some of her servants in man's attire, and embarked as a merchant for Katáha. Soon after her arrival, she found out her husband, and as he was unconsciously influenced by his secret affections, had no difficulty in forming acquaintance and friendship with him. Having also ascertained the presence of her suitors, Desvavitá repaired to the king, and demanded justice. He enquired on what account; to which she replied, that she was in pursuit of four runaway slaves, whom she demanded the king's assistance to recover. The king told her to look round her, as all the people of the city were assembled, and point out the persons she claimed. She immediately designated the four merchants. They were filled with fury at the charge, and appealed to all about them, if they were not known as freemen, and the sons of respectable traders. Devasmitá paid no heed to their vehemence, but coolly desired the Rájá, if he doubted her words, to direct their turbans to be taken off. This was accordingly done, when the branded badge of slavery was manifest upon their foreheads, to the great astonishment of the Rájá and the assembly. To satisfy their curiosity, Deva-smitá related her story. All parties present applauded her spirit, and pronounced the culprits to be in justice her slaves. But in respect to their origin and station, they proposed to give her a large sum for their ransom. With the consent of her husband, this was accepted by Devasmitá, and she and Guhasena returned together to Támraliptí, where they continued to reside, possessed of abundance, and happy in each other.

Story of Vatsa—resumed.

Whilst Vatsa and the princess yet remained with the friendly forest chief, an envoy arrived from Chandasena, to tell them that he was far from displeased with what had occurred, and was about to send his son Gopálaka to represent him at his daughter's marriage. Vatsa was well contented with this intelligence; and, leaving a considerable portion of his attendants to await the arrival of Gopálaka, he and Vāsavadattá set off to Kauśámbí.

A mighty train of elephants followed in the prince's march, as if the forest had yielded its stateliest tribes to do him honour. The earth, echoing to the hoofs of numerous steeds, heralded his advance; and the clouds of dust that canopied the host appeared like the flying mountains before Indra had clipped their wings¹. Having set off at dawn, Vatsa came in sight of his capital on the following day, and halted for the night at the residence of Rumañwán. On the third day he made his public entry into the city, which assumed all her ornaments, and looked like a bride that welcomed her long absent lord. The roads and streets were lined with the citizens, delighted to behold their monarch again; and the windows and houses were crowded with their wives and daughters, eager to behold their master's choice. The air was rent with their acclamations, when Vatsa and the princess¹ passed, mounted on the same elephant, and resembling a dark cloud girt with lightning; as if the prince had brought back in person the tutelary goddess of his fame.

In a short time Gopálaka arrived. Vatsa went out to meet him, and conducted him to his sister, who welcomed him with tears. The marriage ceremony was immediately solemnized. As Vatsa took her hand, the whole frame of Vāsavadattá shook with agitation, a thick film overspread her eyes, and existence seemed to be on the point of yielding to the shafts of Káma-deva². The prompt support of her lord sustained her steps, and led her in due repetition round the holy fire³. When the ceremony was completed, Gopálaka

Vatsa's Second Marriage.

After some period had elapsed, Yogandharáyāña, the minister, anxious to excite the prince to exploits worthy of his character and descent, held this discourse with Rumañwán.—“Our sovereign Vatsa, as descended from the illustrious house of Pañdu, is undoubtedly entitled to the capital Hástinapura, and dominion over the world. Neglecting these lofty claims, he is contented to rule over a limited territory, and wasting his time upon women, wine, and the chase, leaves to our charge the conduct of the state. But this is highly unbecoming his family and his talents, and we must endeavour to animate him to such efforts as shall retrieve his character, and extend his power. There is no occasion to despair. The worst cases are susceptible of cure, and ingenuity can effect any thing. In proof of what I say, listen to this anecdote.—There was a king, named Mahásena, who was attacked by another sovereign, defeated, and compelled to pay tribute. He was a prince of high spirit, and his humiliation preyed upon his mind, so that he fell ill of the spleen, and was brought by fretting and the disease to the verge of the grave. Medicines were administered in vain; and his physician, as a last hope, entered suddenly into his chamber, apparently in great distress, and abruptly announced to him that the queen was dead. The news agitated the king violently, and he cast himself on the ground in a paroxysm of sorrow. The abscess in the spleen was burst by the effort, and his health immediately improved. The physician, satisfied with the manifest change, confessed the falsehood by which it was occasioned. This giving a fresh impetus to the king's spirits, he speedily resumed his former energies, and was soon able to levy an army, with which he attacked, and triumphed over his former conqueror¹.—In this manner let us serve our prince in his own despite;—and in the first place, we must gain over the only monarch that stands in our way, Pradyota, king of Magadha¹.

The two counsellors accordingly debated how Pradyota was to be made their master's friend, and determined that it could only be contrived by Vatsa's marrying his daughter. At the same time they knew that he never would permit the princess to be the second wife of any monarch; and Yogandharáyana proposed that they should secure the aid of Vāsavadattá, and with her concurrence disseminate a belief of her death. To this Rumañwán objected the discredit they should sustain if their scheme were detected, as happened to the ascetic at Sákarmiká on the Ganges.

Story of an Ascetic.

An ascetic, who professed to have imposed upon himself a vow of perpetual silence, lived in great repute at that city. He subsisted on charity, had many mendicant disciples, and occupied with them a conventual dwelling, with a temple attached. At the house of a pious banker, who held the holy man in great

The point of the story is the same as that of the "Deux Anglais à Paris", a Fabliau, and of "Une femme à l'extrémité qui se mit en si grosse colère voyant son mari qui baisoit sa servante qu'elle recouvra la santé", of Marguerite of Navarre. reverence, the ascetic was accustomed to receive alms, and in so doing had frequent opportunities of seeing the banker's daughter, a girl of extraordinary beauty. Her charms made an impression upon the mendicant; and allowing his passions to master his penance, he long meditated upon the means by which, without betraying his hypocrisy, he might get her into his power.

Having at last devised what he thought a likely scheme, he repaired to the banker's house, and received his usual donation from the fair hands of the damsel. As he departed, he exclaimed, loud enough to be overheard by the father, "Alas! alas! that such things should be!" Exclamations that in themselves, as well as their violation of the mendicant's supposed vow, could not fail to excite the banker's curiosity. He therefore followed the ascetic to his cell, and when there, asked him earnestly what had induced him to break his silence. The mendicant replied, with some hesitation, and affected distress: "Regard for you, my good friend, overcame my solemn obligations. I read in your daughter's countenance a sad reverse for you: and whenever she marries, you, your wife, and sons, will inevitably perish. This conviction forced from me the exclamations you heard. It cannot now be remedied; but if you have any affection for the rest of your family, you will rid yourself of your daughter. Put her by night into a basket covered with leather¹, place a lamp upon it, and thus offer her to the holy Ganges." The banker, who implicitly trusted in the words of this villainous hypocrite, went home in an agony of fear and affliction, and, when night came, did as he had been enjoined.

The ascetic, at the same hour, directed his disciples to repair to the river; and if they saw a basket with a lamp upon it, bring it ashore, and privately convey it to him, prohibiting them rigidly from any attempt to inspect its contents. They obeyed his commands, and kept a look out for the object to which their attention had been directed by their master.

In the mean time, however, a Rajput, walking upon the bank, was struck by the appearance of the floating light, and with the assistance of his servants, brought the basket ashore, before the current had conveyed it where the mendicant's followers were stationed. Having opened it, and found the maiden, to his great surprise and delight, the Rajput conveyed her to his house, which was near at hand; and learning her story, determined to expose and punish the ascetic. He therefore substituted a fierce baboon for the damsel; and fastening the basket again, committed it to the current as before. It was now taken possession of by the mendicants, and agreeably to the orders of their chief, carried unopened to the convent. He commanded them to place it in his chamber, and then desired them to go to rest, and on no account to approach his cell, whatever noises they might hear, at it was his design to pass the night in some very solemn and momentous mysteries. They obeyed, and repaired to their repose.

The ascetic, being thus at liberty to accomplish his purposes, secured the door of his cell, and eagerly opened the basket. He had scarcely done so, when the baboon sprang upon him, and bit and scratched him unmercifully. It was in vain he called for assistance; his disciples were too mindful of his previous injunctions to venture near him. At last, with much difficulty, and after the loss of his nose and ears, he contrived to get out of his cell, and alarm the other inhabitants of the domicile, by whose aid he was extricated from the clutches of his savage assailant. His secret, however, was divulged, and in the morning the story was spread throughout the town. The banker gave his daughter to her deliverer, and the ascetic was glad to make his escape in a whole skin from a place where his iniquitous schemes had exposed him to universal derision and contempt*.

This story was insufficient to deter Yogandharáyāna from the prosecution of his scheme; and Rumañwán, therefore, shifting his ground, argued the danger of Vatsa's dying through grief for the supposed loss of his queen: separation from the object of our affections being often, he said, attended with serious results, as was the case with Devasena.

Story of Devasena.

In Śrāvastī dwelt a merchant of great opulence; but his richest treasure was a daughter of such surpassing loveliness, that all who beheld her became her slaves, and sacrificed their understandings to their passion. The father, conscious of her extraordinary beauty, resolved to offer her to the king, Devasena, as, should he wed her to any other person, he apprehended he might afterwards incur the resentment of the Rājā. Accordingly, he requested Devasena's acceptance of the damsel, and the Rājā sent some trustworthy Brahmins to visit the maiden, and report upon her qualifications. When they beheld her, and found her so singularly beautiful, it occurred to them that if the Rājā married her he was likely to be fascinated with her charms, and to neglect on her account the duties of his station. They therefore reported, that, although a girl of good appearance, yet the marks upon her face and hands¹ were indicative of misfortune, and she was consequently unfit to become the bride of the king.

¹ The Sāmudrikā Vidyā, or science of palmistry, as intimately connected with astrology, was once carried to as extravagant a height in India as in Europe. It is not much cultivated at present, but is not perhaps the less believed. [Comp. the Śābdakalpadruma, s. v. Sāmudrakam.]

This negotiation being closed, the merchant soon afterwards married his daughter to the commander of the army, and nothing more was thought of the matter. It happened, however, some time afterwards that the Rájá beheld the bride at the window of her husband's palace, and was instantly the victim of a violent passion, blended with the mortifying recollection that he was the cause of his own disappointment. These thoughts preyed upon his mind, and induced a severe fever, which put an end to his existence¹.

Yogandharáyāna, being unmoved by these examples, proposed to refer the point to the queen's brother, and he concurring heartily in the project, Rumañwán was compelled to wave his objections. With a view, therefore, to effect their purpose, they persuaded Vatsa to set out on a hunting expedition to the district of Lá-váñaka², which bordered on Magadha.

When Vatsa was about to quit his capital, he was surprised by no ordinary visitor. The sage Nárada descended from mid heaven, and was received by the prince and princess with every mark of veneration.

² This name is not now to be traced in any maps of that part of the country. [It is probably the same as Lavañanagara, a place mentioned in an inscription from Chedi. See Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, Vol. XXX, p. 321.]

The object of his visit was in fact to prepare the minds of both for the events about to take place; and he announced to Vatsa the approach of temporary affliction, which would end in increased happiness, whilst he foretold to Vásavadattá, that she would be the mother of a prince, who should obtain the sovereignty over the Vidyádhara, or spirits of air. Having made these communications to them, he again disappeared.

Vatsa now set off upon his hunting excursion, leaving his minister, as usual, to conduct public affairs. Yogandharáyāna lost no time in imparting the scheme to Vásavadattá, who, foregoing, in the prospect of her husband's aggrandizement, all selfish considerations, cheerfully consented to contribute to its success. Accordingly the old minister assumed the dress of a Brahman, and Vásavadattá the character of his daughter. Vasantaka, fantastically disguised, was the supposed Brahman's disciple; and in this capacity they proceeded to Magadha. Rumañwán, left behind, shortly after their departure set fire to the palace, so effectually, that it was half consumed before any assistance could be procured; and he circulated a report, which was generally credited, that the queen had perished in the flames.

The party who had proceeded to the capital of Magadha soon contrived to throw themselves in the way of Padmávatí, the young princess. She was interested by the appearance of Vásavadattá, and summoned the trio to her presence to ascertain who they were. Yogandharáyāna's story was, that Vásavadattá was his daughter, and had been deserted by a husband of whom they were now in search; and at his request the princess gladly undertook to take care of the supposed daughter, whilst he was engaged in the pursuit more actively by having safely disposed of her. Vāsavadattá being thus provided for, the two ministers, relinquishing their disguises, repaired to Lávánaka to seek Vatsa, and condole with him for his loss.

Upon the first communication of the afflicting news, Vatsa was overcome with grief, and was with some difficulty prevented from laying violent hands upon himself. After his first emotions had subsided, however, he recollected the prophesy of Nárada; and observing something rather suspicious in the pretended sorrow of his friends, he felt inclined to conjecture that Vāsavadattá was still alive, and in expectation of her re-appearance, determined quietly to await the result.

When the news of Vāsavadattá's death reached the king of Magadha, he readily availed himself of the opportunity to secure a suitable bridegroom for his daughter, and sent his ambassadors to propose the alliance. Vatsa, conformably to the plan he had laid down for himself, made no difficulty upon Yogandharáyana's urging the match, and the young princess had been prepared by Vāsavadattá to think of Vatsa with interest and affection. All parties being thus agreed, there was no plea for delay; and Vatsa going from Lávánaka to the capital of Magadha, the marriage was celebrated with due solemnity and pomp.

In a short time Vatsa, having taken leave of his father-in-law, returned to his own kingdom, his heart still pining for Vāsavadattā, and impatient at her protracted disappearance. She in the mean while had been secretly conducted back to Lávāṇaka, where Vatsa continued to reside, and was concealed in her brother's palace. There at last Vatsa was allowed, as if by chance, to see her. He hastened towards her, but before he could clasp her to his breast, his agitation overcame his faculties, and he fell senseless on the ground. He was recovered by the endearments of his beloved wife, and awoke to be conscious that Vāsavadattā was once more his. It is unnecessary to describe his happiness. The affection that had before united the two princesses was increased by their affinity; and although the king of Magadha was at first displeased by the trick that had reduced his daughter to the station of a younger wife, yet when he learnt the perfect union which prevailed between her and Vāsavadattā, he suppressed his indignation, and cordially rejoiced in the success of the scheme that had given Padmāvatī to Vatsa.

When a sufficient period had been devoted to domestic enjoyments, the minister Yogandharāyaṇa urged his master to undertake the subjugation of the surrounding regions especially those to the east, assigning as reasons for such a preference, that the north was occupied by barbarians; in the west, the sun and planets were obscured; the south bordered on the domains of the Rákshasas; whilst the east was under the regency of Indra, and was the quarter in which the sun rose, and to which the Ganges flowed. The country between the Vindhya and Himála mountains, and that watered by the Jáhnví, was the more excellent; and the progenitors of Vatsa had established themselves along the course of the sacred stream, having held their court at Hástinapura, until Śatánika transferred it to Kauśámbi.

The advice of the minister was highly agreeable to the ambition of the monarch, and Vatsa therefore immediately prepared for his expedition. His fathers-in-law, the kings of Ujjayiní and Magadha, furnished powerful accessions to his force; and Gopálaka, the brother of Vásavadattá, whom Vatsa had made king of Vaideha, and Sinhavarmá, the brother of the queen Padmávatí, who held the sovereignty of Chedi*, both accompanied Vatsa with all their troops. The friendly chief of the forest tribes likewise joined the army, and the host spread over the country like the mighty clouds that precede the rains: the steeds glittered with golden trappings, and the war elephants were decorated with vermilion and flowers. The sun was concealed by the dust that canopied the multitude, until scattered by the countless banners that agitated the labouring air. Vatsa rode a stately elephant, whilst the imperial umbrella waved over his head, like a fierce lion recumbent beneath a tree that spreads its solitary shade upon the summit of a mountain. The two queens followed his march, like the personified divinities Victory and Fame.

The arms of Vatsa were first directed against Brahmadata, king of Benares, who finding resistance hopeless hastened to acknowledge submission. Hence the conqueror proceeded to the shores of the eastern Sea, where he erected columns commemorative of his triumph¹. He then exacted tribute from Kalinga² and Anga, and proceeded westwards to the Mahendra mountains. The terrified inhabitants fled to the Vindhyan caves³, and the forest monarchs promptly prof-

He then subdued the Muralas²; and fording the sevenfold channel of the Godávarí he reduced the Málavas to obedience. Having then crossed the Revá, he arrived at Ujjayiní, where he remained some time with his father-in-law, the delighted sire of Vásavadattá.

After a short interval of repose, Vatsa proceeded to the west, where he overran the province of Láta³,

The first portion, it appears, is designated in the text by the term Mahendra. Ptolemy has a range called Maiandrus, but it lies east of Bengal. Wilford supposes the Maiandrus mountains, to derive their name from Mayanádri, the mountains of the Mayun, a people between Chittagong and Aracan. It is not impossible, however, that they bore the appellation of Mahendra, and that either Ptolemy or our text, or both, have mistaken their precise situation.

² The Muralas are not traceable in classical geography, unless we are allowed to conjecture, that they are the same with the Curula of Ptolemy, a town lying in the direction, where we might expect to meet with the Muralas of the text. He then visited the father of his queen Padmâvatî at Magadha, and after enjoying the pleasures of his court for a short interval, returned in triumph to Lâvâṇaka.

After his return to his capital, Vatsa continued to spend his time in the society of his queens and friends with uninterupted felicity. His only anxiety was now to possess offspring to perpetuate his race; and his wish was soon gratified, the queen Vâsavadattâ being delivered of a son, who was an incarnation of the god of love, and who, as was announced by Nârada, was destined to exercise sovereignty over the spirits of heaven. He was named Naravâhanadatta. At the same period, the king's three ministers and the chamberlain had sons; and these four, with two other youths, the offspring of a Brahman female, a favourite of the Story of Naraváhanadatta, the Son of Vatsa.

Vatsa now devoted his whole attention to the care and education of his only son, in such a manner as to occasion inattention to his public duties. His minister Yogandharáyana expostulated with him on this account, and told him, that there was no need of anxiety for one, whom Śiva had announced should become the supreme monarch of the Vidyádharas², and who was attended unremittingly by an invisible guard. As he said this, a celestial being, wearing a gorgeous diadem, and armed with a scymitar, stood before them. To Vatsa's demands who he was, and what was his purpose, he replied, that he was the king of the Vidyádharas, obliged by the superior power of his enemies to withdraw from his dominions: that he knew the son of Vatsa was destined to be his paramount lord, and he was desirous of being the first to do him homage. Vatsa felt highly gratified by his confirmation of his son's future elevation, and received Śaktivega, (so the king of the Vidyádhara was named,) with every mark of respect. In their conversation he enquired how the station of Vidyádhara was to be obtained; to which Śaktivega replied, it was the recompense of propitiating the deity Śankara; and in evidence of this assertion narrated his story to Vatsa, and the queen Vāsavadattá.

Story of Śaktivega.

In the city of Varddhamána, the ornament of the earth, reigned Paropakári, a pious and benevolent prince. He had an only daughter, named Kanakarekhá, a princess of surpassing charms, created by Brahmá to humble the conceit of Lakshmi in her beauty. As she grew in years, the king became desirous to see her married, but was much at a loss to find a suitor worthy of her hand. Nor was this the only cause of perplexity: the princess could not endure the idea of becoming a wife, and professed she would rather die than be separated from her parents. As they, however, continued to urge the propriety and necessity of her marriage, she at last consented to take for her husband any one of Brahmanical or Kshatriya origin, who should have beheld "The Golden City;" and with this the king her father was of necessity contented.

The object of Paropakárf was now to find some man of exalted rank who had seen this city; but all the princes and nobles of his court declared, they not only had never seen, but had never heard of such a place. The king's only resource, therefore, was to appeal to the people; and public proclamation was repeatedly made, that any man of the priestly or military tribe who had beheld "The Golden City" should have the princess for his bride, and be installed in the joint administration of regal authority. The proclamations were unavailing: no one knew any thing about the "Golden City".

At last a young Brahman, named Śaktideva, who for his idle habits had been expelled his father's house, and who had lost all his money in gambling, considering his situation desperate, and indifferent to the consequences, falsely pretended having sojourned in the "Golden City". As the king was unable to judge of his veracity, he referred the pretender to his daughter. The princess having heard his story, was at no loss to detect the fraud, and ordered Śaktideva to be turned out of her presence without any ceremony. She then reproved her father for being so credulous, and told him it was his duty, both as a father and a king, to be upon his guard against impostors. They were sufficiently numerous, she said, and many were their contrivances; and she related to the king the following story in confirmation of her remarks.

Story of Śiva and Mádharma.

In the city of Ratnapura, two rogues, one named Śiva, and the other named Mádharma, had resided for some time, and had fleeced every inhabitant of the place. They thought it high time, therefore, to change the scene of their operations, and selected Ujjayinī as the object of their next visitation; particularly as they heard that the king's Brahman, Śankara Swāmī, was a weak, credulous old man, and immensely rich, with an only daughter exceedingly beautiful. Having concerted their scheme, they set out to Ujjayinī.

Mádharma having collected a respectable train, assumed the character of a Rajput nobleman, and halted with his attendants at a village without the city. Śiva entered Ujjayinī alone, and having found a deserted temple on the banks of the Siprá, he took up his abode in it in the character of a religious ascetic. In this capacity he soon attracted notice by the seeming severity of his penance. Having well smeared himself with mud, he plunged every day at dawn head foremost into the stream, and remained for a long period under water. Rising with the sun, he faced the luminary, as if lost in prayer and meditation. Repairing to the temple, he worshipped the deity with flowers, and seated in the positions practised by the tribe of Yogīs, appeared wholly occupied with abstract devotion, whilst in fact he was only devising fraudulent projects. In the afternoon, clad in the skin of the black deer, and taking his staff and hollow cocoanut, he traversed the city to gather food in alms. Of the rice so collected he made an ostentatious distribution, dividing it into three parts, giving one to the crows, one to any person who chose to take it, and reserving the third for himself. At night he remained alone in the temple; for he made light of those places, which people in general avoid. The inhabitants of the city, beholding these daily observances, and the life of austerity that Śiva led, very soon formed a high opinion of his sanctity, and numbers flocked about the holy man, eager to prostrate themselves at his feet.

When Mádhave had ascertained by his emissaries the success, that had attended his comrade's imposture, he judged it time to play his part. He therefore entered the city, and engaged a spacious mansion at some distance from the palace. Performing his ablutions in the Siprá, he took the opportunity of renewing his intercourse with his associate by professing to recognize him as a religious man of singular sanctity, whom he had before encountered on his travels, and shewing him accordingly extreme veneration. Śiva at night repaid his visit; and they ate and drank, and made merry together, and concerted their future measures.

On the following morning, Mádhave sent a messenger with a present to Śankara Śwámí, the king's priest, to announce himself as a Rájput of rank, who had just arrived from the Dakhiń, and would gladly take service along with his followers with the monarch of Ujjayiní. He hinted also, that he did not want either the means or inclination to be liberal; in proof of which he sent two pieces of fine cloth for his acceptance. The old man fell into the snare, and, blinded by cupidity, promised the stranger his influence with the king. This promise, his zeal being stimulated by fresh presents, he speedily performed; and at his recommendation Mádhava and his followers were enrolled amongst the prince's retainers. The priest carried his attention still further, and in the hope of ultimate advantage, gave the pretended Rájputs accommodation within the precincts of his own stately residence.

When Mádhava took up his abode in the dwelling of Śankara Swámí, he requested permission to deposit his jewels in the old man's private treasury—a permission readily granted. The jewels, which were numerous, and seemed costly, were all artificial; but they were fabricated with great skill, and impressed the old priest with the conviction of their being genuine, and of immense value. Mádhava then, by a course of extreme abstinence, reduced himself to a most meagre condition; and pretending to be dangerously ill, requested Śankara Swámí to bring him some pious Brahman, to whom he might present his property, as he was certain he could not long survive. The old man consented; but whilst he hesitated about a choice, one of the attendants, previously prepared, suggested, that they should send for the holy man, who occupied the temple on the banks of the Siprá, and who was held in high repute throughout the city. This was Mádhavava's confederate, Śiva, who was now to be brought into action. Śankara Swámī readily assented; and having his own views in the arrangement, undertook to summon the ascetic himself. He accordingly repaired to Śiva, and with profound reverence opened the business to him. A Rájput of rank, he said, was on the point of death, and was anxious to present him with all his wealth, which in jewels was most valuable, if he would condescend to accept it. To this Śiva replied, that he pardoned him for making such a proposal; but it was very absurd, to offer transitory and perishable treasures to one, whose whole delights were penance and mortification, and whose sole object was divine knowledge: he therefore declined accompanying him to the sick man. This affected indifference only served to whet Śankara's zeal, and he expatiated eloquently on the enjoyments of social life, as contrasted with ascetic privation; the superiority of the householder in the discharge of his obligations to the gods and to mankind, and the happiness conferred upon the human condition by the possession of wife and children. By arguments of this nature Śiva suffered himself to be softened; and at last he acknowledged, that he might be induced possibly to resume his connexion with society, if he could meet with a wife in any family sufficiently pure to be affianced with his own. Śankara Swámī availed himself instantly of this opening, and proposed his own daughter, if Śiva would relinquish to him the wealth he should receive from the Rájput, engaging at the same time to provide handsomely for his maintenance. With much affected reluctance, Śiva at last consented to wed the daughter of the priest; and as to the property, he left that entirely to his father-in-law's disposal. Śankara Swámī, internally setting down the ascetic for a fool, and congratulating himself on his own cunning, lost no time in executing the conditions. He took Śiva with him to his house, and married him to his daughter, and on the third day conducted him to Mádhava. Mádhava received them with every mark of reverence, and requesting the prayers of the pretended saint, presented him with the casket of false jewels. Śiva having received them, handed them over to his father-in-law, professing to be utterly ignorant of their quality or value. He then bestowed his benediction on the invalid, and withdrew with the delighted Śankara Swámī, now in possession of the prize he had been so anxious to secure.

After a short interval Mádhava pretended to recover his health, being restored, he asserted, by the benediction of the Brahman. Śiva also by degress shewed himself dissatisfied with his situation; and at last expressed his determination to dwell apart from his father-in-law, claiming at least half the jewels, which had been presented to him. Śankara, to appease his clamours, and unwilling to part with any of the jewels, transferred to him all his own personal property; and with this Śiva maintained a house and establishment of his own. In order to raise money, the priest was now induced to dispose of one of the supposed inestimable ornaments. When the jewellers examined it, they admired the skill with which it was fabricated, but pronounced it made of crystal and coloured glass, set in brass, and of no value. Bewildered with apprehension, Śankara produced the casket, and all its contents proved to be counterfeits like the first. He was struck, as if with a thunderbolt, and was some time before he knew where he was, or what had become of him. His dream of wealth was at an end, and he found too late that he had been grossly imposed upon.

The priest's first thought was to get back his own money from Śiva, to whom he repaired, and proposed to give him up the jewels, saying not a syllable of his discovery. To this offer, however, Śiva replied, that he should have no objection, but that in truth all the money was expended. Śankara then applied to the king for redress, and at his suit the confederates were brought up for enquiry. When called upon for his defence, Śiva averred, that he had not sought the bargain, and that he had all along professed his entire ignorance of the nature, and cost of the ornaments. If they were false, therefore, Śankara could not blame him on that account, as he had taken them entirely on his own proposal and valuation. In like manner, Mādhava protested his innocence of any intention to defraud. Such as the ornaments were, he said, he had inherited them from his father, and he was wholly unacquainted with their real worth. In giving them as a free-will offering to a holy man, he could have had no object in passing off artificial gems as genuine, as he had nothing to gain by the imposition; and that he was free from all dishonest purposes, was manifest by his recovering, in consequence of his donation, from a malady which threatened to put a period to his existence. The defence set up by the two rogues was so plausible, that they were immediately acquitted of all fraudulent intention, and Śankara Swámí was judged to have deserved the consequences of his own avarice. He was therefore dismissed with the ridicule of the court, and lost his credit, as well as his daughter and his money. Śíva and Mádhava, on the contrary, were held as innocent and fortunate men, and their knavery was rewarded with the countenance of the king, and the enjoyment of the prosperity they so ill deserved¹.

¹ Part of the fraud, or the substitution of false for real ornaments, is similar to the incident in "Rule a Wife and have a Wife", which procures Perez the title of the Copper Captain; as Estifania says:

"Sir, there's your treasure, sell it to a tinker,
To mend old kettles.
Your clothes are parallel to these, all counterfeit;
Put these and them on, you're a man of copper."

Having finished her story the Princess recommended to her father to benefit by the lesson, and to be cautious to whom he gave credit, and she repeated her wish, that he would not be anxious with respect to her marriage, as she was contented to remain unespoused. To this the king replied, that it was not good for a young woman to grow up unmarried. The world was censorious, and very ready to attach blame undeserved, and the more amiable the character, the more was it the mark of malice. In proof of which he cited the adventure of Haraswámí.

Story of Haraswámí.

On the banks of the Ganges in the city of Kusumapura resided a holy man named Haraswámí, the simplicity of whose manners, and whose uninterrupted course of devotion, had won the regard and esteem of all the citizens: there was one man however on whom they produced an opposite effect, and who unable to bear the sight of so much piety resolved to attempt the ruin of the Ascetic.

With this intent he contrived to disseminate a report, that Haraswámí was very far from being the character he appeared, that his sanctity was assumed, and that in secret he was the worshipper of some of the terrific divinities, to whom he made a practice of sacrificing children. The rumour soon gained ground, and it was asserted and generally believed, that a great number of children had recently been lost to their parents, whose disappearance was thus accounted for.

The people of the city now flocking together would have proceeded to the hermitage of Haraswámí to put him to death; but the chief Brahmins, standing in some awe of his character, prevailed upon them to be satisfied with his exile. Messengers were sent to him, therefore, to desire him to leave the neighbourhood without delay. Highly surprised by this command, Haraswámí begged to know how he had incurred such a sentence, and on being informed determined with the courage of conscious innocence to face his accusers. He therefore repaired to the city, and, addressing the people collected on the walls, begged them to listen but for a moment, before they condemned him for ever. Has any one amongst you, continued he, lost his child? The question startled them. Each looked at his fellow and saw himself reproached for precipitation. Many had their children by their sides—others went off to their different homes to ascertain if their children were safe, and in a short time all were obliged to confess that the accusation was wholly unfounded, and that they had unjustly banished the pious man! So easy is it, said the Prince, to affix a stigma on the most spotless characters. You must not expect my child, added Paropakárí, to escape, and should this happen, should calumny blight your youth, you will be the means of plunging a shaft in your father's heart.

When Kanakarekhá observed her father thus earnest, she forbore to press the subject, contenting herself with repeating her readiness to marry any one of the priestly or martial tribe, who should behold the Golden city, and with this the king was compelled to be satisfied.

In the mean time Śaktideva, ashamed of the exposure he had suffered, and deeply enamoured of the princess, determined to discover this unknown city, or perish in the undertaking. If he succeeded, he should win the only object for which he now felt life desirable, and if he failed, existence was well sacrificed in such a cause.—Resolved therefore to return successful or return no more, Śaktideva quitted Varddhamána, and directed his course to the South¹.

After winding his way for some time through the intricacies of the Vindhya forest, he came to a hermitage by the side of a pellucid pool, the residence of a pious ascetic and his disciples: having been received with kindness and hospitably entertained by the venerable Sage who had counted a hundred years, Śaktideva informed him of the object of his journey, and enquired of him, if he knew where the Golden city was to be found. The Sage replied, he had never heard of the name, but recommended Śaktideva to seek the hermitage of his elder brother¹, who might possibly give him some information, and directed him to the place, three hundred Yojanas remote in the country of Kámpilya: with this direction Śaktideva cheerfully resumed his route.

Upon his arrival at the habitation of the elder ascetic, he speedily announced the purport of his visit, with no better success, however, than before. The Sage had never heard of the Golden city. He recommended Śaktideva to visit an Island in the ocean named Utsthala, the Nisháda Prince of which would probably know something of the city, if any such place existed, and he directed his visitor how to shape his course for that Island. In conformity to the instructions of the Sage, Śaktideva, after a wearisome journey, arrived at Vitankapura, a flourishing city on the sea shore. Here he found a vessel bound for Utsthala, and took his passage on board.

After they had been at sea a few days they encountered a furious storm. The lightning shot along the heavens like the forked tongue of fate, and the thunder growled as if a demon roared: the wrathful breeze bowing the light, and uprooting the resisting objects, lashed the ocean, and mighty waves as vast as mountains angrily heaved upon the deep. The vessel, now tossed to the clouds, and now precipitated into the abyss, was unable to resist the fury of the elements and was rent asunder: some of the crew clinging to the broken spars were taken up by other vessels, which were scattered by the gale, but Śaktideva who had clung to a plank was cast ashore upon a distant Island. It happened, that this was the Island he was bound to, and one of the first persons he encountered on the head, was Satyavrata the king. Satyavrata having heard his story expressed great interest in Śaktideva's adventure, and, although unable to direct him to the Golden city, undertook to assist him in his search.

After a short time, Satyavrata proposed to Śaktideva to go to an island at some short distance, where at a particular season of the year, now at hand, a solemn festival in honour of an image of Hari was observed: on this occasion people from all quarters resorted to the place, and some of them might probably afford information of the Golden city. Śaktideva readily consented, and they embarked on board a sloop, and set off for the island named Ratnakūṭa: on their way Śaktideva observed an object in the middle of the sea, the nature of which he was at a loss to comprehend. It looked like a Beṛ tree, but in size equalled a mountain: he called Satyavrata to look at it, who immediately exclaimed, they were lost: the object they beheld was a vast tree of miraculous growth, rising from the centre of a whirlpool: every thing caught within the gulph inevitably perished, and they had been carried by the current so near it that there was now no chance of escape. As he spoke this the ship was whirled within the circling tide, and in an instant was submerged. Śaktideva, however, exerting all his activity sprang from the deck as they were sinking, and clung to one of the pendulous branches of the tree, from which he ascended, and perched himself securely on a more substantial bough¹. The rest of

¹ These incidents offer coincidences of exceeding interest, for they are neither more nor less than Homeric: in the same manner as the Beʻ or Indian Fig rises from the whirlpool, so an immense Wild Fig tree hangs over Charybdis, and Ulysses like Śaktideva makes his escape by jumping upon the tree. The course of this fable eastward or westward cannot now be conjectured, but the specification of the Tree seems to make it of Indian origin. The character of the Beʻ and its spreading and pendulous branches render it appropriate enough in our story, whilst there is no obvious reason why Homer should have availed himself of the Fig, any more than of any other tree: the following are the passages referred to;

*Τὸν δ' ἔτερον ἀχόπελον χθαμαλώτερον ὕψει, Ὀδυσσεῦ, Πλήσιον ἀλλήλων· καὶ κεν διοττεύσεις.
Τῷ δ' ἐν ἐρινεὸς ἐστὶ μέγας, φίλλοισι τεθηλῶς.
Τῷ δ' ὑπὸ δία Χάρυβδις ἀναρῶιβδεῖ μέλαν ὕδωρ.*

Close by a rock of less enormous height
Breaks the wild wave and forms a dangerous streight;
Full on its crown a fig's green branches rise,
And shoot a leafy forest to the Skies,
Beneath Charybdis holds her boisterous reign
Midst roaring whirlpools, and absorbs the main.

Pope, Odyssey XII, 125-130 (101-4).

the day was spent in this position, and Śaktideva despairing of any chance of being extricated from it, was about to precipitate himself into the gulph below, when a sudden noise interrupted his design. This

*Ἰαννύχιος φερόμην· ἅμα δ' ἡελίῳ ἀνιόντι
 Ἦλθον ἐπὶ Σκύλλης σκόπελον, δεινὴν τε Χάρυβδιν.

All night I drove and at the dawn of day
 Fast by the rocks beheld the desperate way:
 Just when the Sea within her gulfs subsides,
 And in the roaring whirlpools rush the tides,
 Swift from the float I vaulted with a bound,
 The lofty fig-tree seized, and clung around;
 So to the beam the bat tenacious clings,
 And pendant round it clasps his leathern wings:
 High in the air the tree its boughs displayed,
 And on the dungeon cast a dreadful shade.

Pope, Odyssey XII, 517-526 (429-36).

The translation is however exceedingly loose here, and the description of the tree in the original is in fact exceedingly applicable to the Banyan tree. Ulysses says he could neither find a place to fix his foot nor could he climb upwards, for the roots were far off, and the branches were lofty and long, and large, and hung over the gulph: but to what then did he cling? if he had got hold of a branch at all it might be supposed possible for him to have ascended it. If however it was a pendulous or radiating branch, the passage is clear enough. Cowper says:

"I seized the branches fast of the wild fig."

But the original is merely,

"Sprung upon the tall fig tree."

was occasioned by the approach of a flight of birds of enormous size, the progeny of Garuḍa, the wind of whose wings fanned the ocean into foam. They perched for the night upon the tree, and their presence inspired Śaktideva with the hope of deliverance. As morning was about to dawn he gently approached the stoutest of the flock, and threw himself upon the back of the bird. The bird startled from his repose immediately took to his wings, and carried his load rapidly through the air*: at last he made for an island, and nearing the ground allowed Śaktideva to cast himself on the grass. Thus the hand of destiny rescued him from death and, being exerted still more wonderfully in his behalf, Fate brought him to the very place he was in search of, the site of the Goldencity.

The bird alighting in a garden, Śaktideva took the opportunity of sliding from off his back, and safely lodged upon the rich and downy turf. He then rose to survey the place, and observing two damsels gathering flowers, he approached and enquired where he was. To his great joy they replied, the place was named the Golden city, and that it was the residence of Chandraprabhá their mistress, who as well as themselves were of the race of Vidyādhara, and that none but females resided on the island. Śaktideva then desired them to lead him to their queen, with which they readily complied. They conducted him to a stately palace, the columns of which were radiant with precious gems, and the walks were of beaten gold,—a numerous train of beautiful damsels thronged wondering about the new comer, and having learnt his errand, flew to apprise Chandraprabhá of the arrival of a mortal Brahman at their residence. She desired him to be admitted, and rising from her gorgeous throne, upon his entrance, welcomed him with every mark of attention and respect to her court.

Having heard the circumstances, which occasioned his visit, she proceeded to communicate her own story to him. We are four sisters, she observed; the daughters of the king of the Vidyádhara: my three sisters went one day to bathe in the Mandákiní and observing a holy Muni immersed in meditation near the bank, they, giddy with youth, and mirth, disturbed his devotion by sprinkling water upon his holy person. Immodest girls, exclaimed the sage, be born of mortal wombs. Afterwards, in consideration of my father, he announced the termination of the curse to each, and gave them the power of recalling the events of their prior birth: they quitted their celestial forms and were born the daughters of men. My father, overwhelmed with sorrow for their fate, abandoned his condition, and retired to the forests, leaving to me the uncontrolled sovereignty over this residence and the female train. I have expected you, she continued, some time, and on your account have refused the proffered suit of many a Vidyádhara, for the goddess Ambiká appeared to me in my sleep, and announced my espousal with a mortal bridegroom. She now fulfills her prophecy, and brings you hither, where no human means could possibly have procured your access. If you will accept my hand, it only remains that I give my father notice of the event, and ask his approbation. On the approaching fourteenth of the month, he holds the anniversary of a meeting of the Vidyādhara chiefs on mount Rishabha to offer worship to the God of gods: it will be but an absence of two days, and on my return, with his assent, of which there is no doubt, you may receive me as your bride. The charms of Chandraprabhá were more than sufficient to secure her from Śaktideva's rejection, and he awaited in joyful impatience the season that should so richly recompense his toils.

When the day of her departure arrived, Chandraprabhá desired Śaktideva to consider himself master of the palace, but she recommended to him not to ascend the central terrace, as nothing but evil would be the consequence, and with this caution she quitted him: the prohibition only served to whet his curiosity, and he very shortly found himself in the vicinity of the forbidden ground: he ascended the terrace, and beheld three doors richly decorated, leading to separate chambers. One of these he opened, and entered. In the chamber was a bed of gold, and gems, and on it something like a body covered by a sheet of fine cotton: having lifted this up, he was struck with horror to behold his first love, the princess Kanakarekhá, a corpse, as he thought, before him; he could scarcely believe that it was not a dream, and although he could not but be conscious of his possessing his waking faculties, yet as he was satisfied of the impossibility of the princess having been conveyed to the place where he was, he concluded it was some magic device, intended for his perplexity and destruction: he therefore hastily quitted the chamber to explore the others, in each of which he found a similar spectacle, and the apparently lifeless body of a lovely damsel lay extended on a splendid couch. Quitting the last apartment, he looked more deliberately round him, and beheld on a lower level a spacious reservoir of water: descending to this he observed grazing on the borders a handsome horse ready saddled: the animal allowed him to approach, and appeared so perfectly gentle that Śaktideva proceeded to mount. On this, however, the horse started away, and at the same time throwing out his hinder leg, kicked Śaktideva with such violence, that he fell backward into the reservoir: the violence of his fall plunged him considerably below the surface; and upon his rising again above the water, what was his surprise to find himself in the midst of a well known pond in his native city Varddhamána¹!

It was with much difficulty that Śaktideva on making his way out of the water could believe the evidence of his senses, and when he could no longer doubt, he repaired to his home, sorrowfully pondering

on the marvellous event that had befallen him. His father who had long considered him as lost, welcomed his return with rapture, and called his kinsmen to a festival, to celebrate his son's recovery. On the day following, the first thing that saluted Śaktideva's ears, was the old proclamation, that whoever had seen the Golden city, should be rewarded with the Princess. Consoling himself with the idea, that if he had lost Chandraprabhá he had made sure of the Princess, he hastened to the palace, and announced that he was come to claim her hand. The king referred him to her as before. She recognised him, and said he was again come with some tale of his own invention, and should be punished as an impostor. Whether I am an impostor or not, replied Śaktideva, I hope, Princess, you will satisfy my curiosity. I have just seen you in the Golden city, lifeless on a couch. I find you living here. How can this be? He speaks the truth, exclaimed the Princess—he has visited the Golden city, and fate reserves him for still greater wonders. For me, I resume my own body and my own abode: a curse denounced upon me by a holy Sage made me, Gracious king, thy daughter, but in me behold a female of celestial origin, and not of mortal mould. The knowledge of my former state accompanied my present being, and hence my reluctance to wed with one of human kind. Hence also the condition to which my hand was attached; for the discovery of the Golden city by a man was the period assigned by the Sage to my humiliation. It is now terminated and I return to my former rank." So saying she vanished. The sorrow of the king was excessive for her loss, nor was Śaktideva less affected by this, his second disappointment—collecting his fortitude, however, he determined to follow the Princess, and endeavour to find his way to the Golden city once more.

With much fatigue, but little danger, Śaktideva effected his return to the Island of Utsthala, the Princely chief of which had lost his life in endeavouring to promote his success: as the whole of the crew perished, the Islanders had never learned his fate, and upon Śaktideva's re-appearance amongst them, without his companion, the sons of the chief accused him of having murdered their father. Had the latter been engulfed as Śaktideva asserted, how happened it, they urged, that he who was in the same vessel could have escaped? They therefore commanded him to be secured, and confined in a temple of Chañḍī, to whom they determined to sacrifice him a victim on the following morning.

Being left thus secured, he addressed himself to the Goddess, and entreated her protection, and his prayers were not in vain. The Goddess appeared in his dreams, and told him not to fear, and cheered by her assurances he rose in the morning with all his apprehensions removed. At day-break the sister of his persecutors came to the temple to offer her devotion, and was instantly struck by the personal graces of the prisoner. She enquired his story, and being satisfied of his innocence promised, if he would become her husband, she would intercede with her brothers in his behalf. Śaktideva was nothing loth. and Vindumatī accordingly prevailed on the brethren, influenced also by the power of Chañḍī, to give trust to their prisoner's protestations of his innocence, and assent not only to his release, but to his marriage with their sister.

Some time after their nuptials Vindumatī, having excited his curiosity with respect to her origin, consented only to gratify it upon his taking a vow to do what she should desire him: to this with some hesitation he agreed, and she then told him that she was a native of the skies, a Vidyādhari, condemned to assume a mortal form for touching her face with the dry tendon of a cow. While thus engaged in conversation, her brothers entered in violent apprehension, and called upon Śaktideva to arm, and go forth, for a wild boar was laying waste the lands, and had destroyed a number of persons. Śaktideva immediately mounted his horse, and went in pursuit of the animal whom he attacked, and wounded; the Boar fled, and plunged into a cave into which Śaktideva followed him. He had gone but a few yards, when the whole scene was changed, and he found himself in a garden adjoining to a palace in the presence of a damsel of exceeding loveliness: as soon as he recovered a little from his surprise, he addressed the damsel, and enquired who she was. She replied that she was a princess, daughter of a King of the south, termed Chañḍavikrama, that her name was Vindulekhā, and she had been carried off from her father's house by a Daitya, the owner of the garden, and who, being accustomed to ravage the country in the form of a boar, had that day received a mortal wound from the hand of some gallant chief. The princess having communicated her story to Śaktideva put similar questions to him, and on his complying with her request, she claimed him as her fated husband, and returned with him to his dwelling, where they were married.

Vindumatí became pregnant, and when the eighth month had arrived, the first wife of Śaktideva reminded him of his vow: her demand was that he should put Vindulekhá to death, and strangle the babe with his own hands. Śaktideva stood aghast at this horrible proposal, but his wife insisted on the fulfillment of his vow, nay she appealed to the Princess, who to the surprise of her husband was equally urgent with him to accomplish the barbarous act. These importunities and the weight of his obligation at last prevailed, and he perpetrated the act: in the same instant the Princess vanished, and instead of an unborn babe Śaktideva held a Scymitar of more than earthly splendour in his grasp. He turned to Vindumatí, and she explained the mystery. We are all of the Vidyádhara race, four sisters, the daughters of their ancient King, condemned to mortal shapes for the offences of our former being; our deliverance was only to be effected by the achievements you have performed: one sister you saw at the Golden city, another was the Princess of Varddhamána, I am the third, and the fourth has just disappeared. Come; let us to the Golden city:

the sword you hold commands a free passage through the air, and you are yourself changed to the condition of a Vidyádharma. So saying she also vanished. Śaktideva followed them and, arriving at the Golden city, found the four Vidyádharmas assembled awaiting his arrival; they then repaired together to the old king, who welcomed Śaktideva as his son-in-law, and consigned to him the sovereignty over the Golden city, changing his name from Śaktideva to Śaktivega.

Your Majesty is now made acquainted with my story, continued the king of the Vidyádharmas, for I was the Brahman in my former existence, and was elevated to the rank I hold by the favour of Śankara. At the time I succeeded to this dignity my father-in-law announced to me that I must be prepared to resign it, upon the birth of the Son of Vatsa, who in due season should obtain the sovereignty over the spirits of air. Our master is now born, and I was anxious to be the first to offer my homage. I have been highly honoured by the permission to behold him, and I now take my departure.

So saying Śaktivega bowed to the young Prince, to Vatsa, and the queens, and vanished from their sight.

III.

ON THE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL SCIENCES OF THE HINDUS.

From the Oriental Magazine, Vol. I (Calcutta: Febr. 1823), p. 207--12.

THE successful cultivation of the healing art by European skill and learning has left us nothing to learn from the Hindus. In the present state of their knowledge, indeed, we have every thing to teach them; but we are not to infer from what we now behold, that they were never better instructed: there is reason to suspect the contrary, and to conclude, from the imperfect opportunities of investigation we possess, that in medicine, as in astronomy, and metaphysics, the Hindus once kept pace with the most enlightened nations of the world; and that they attained as thorough a proficiency in medicine and surgery, as any people whose acquisitions are recorded, and as indeed was practicable, before anatomy was made known to us by the discoveries of modern enquirers.

It might easily be supposed, that their patient attention, and natural shrewdness, would render the Hindus excellent observers; whilst the extent, and fertility of their native country would furnish them with many valuable drugs and medicaments.—Their Nidána or Diagnosis, accordingly, appears to define and distinguish symptoms with great accuracy, and their Dravyábhidhána, or Materia Medica, is sufficiently voluminous.—They have also paid great attention to regimen and diet, and have a number of works on the food and general treatment, suited to the complaint, or favourable to the operation of the medicine administered. This branch they entitle Pa-thyápathya. To these subjects are to be added the Chikitsá, or medical treatment of diseases—on which subject they have a variety of compositions, containing much absurdity, with much that is of value; and the Rasavidyá, or Pharmacy, in which they are most deficient. All these works, however, are of little avail to the present generation, as they are very rarely studied, and still more rarely understood, by any of the practising empirics.

The divisions of the science thus noticed, as existing in books, exclude two important branches, without which the whole system must be defective—Anatomy and Surgery. We can easily imagine, that these were not likely to have been much cultivated in Hindustan, and that local disadvantages, and religious prejudices, might have formed very serious impediments to their acquirement.—Something of the former might be accidentally picked up by the occasional inspection of bodies, either brutal or human, which happened to be exposed; but we can scarcely expect dissections of the latter, amongst the Hindus, when we find that the Greeks themselves did not venture beyond animal subjects, even in the time of Aristotle.—In the absence of anatomy, of course, little was to be looked for in surgery; and it has been taken for granted that, whatever might have been the character of medical science, amongst the Hindus in former days, an almost utter ignorance has always prevailed on the subjects most essential to its perfect possession and practical application.—These ideas, however, are perhaps partially erroneous, and rest on our own imperfect knowledge of the medical literature of the Hindus.

The Hindu compositions on medical subjects, and even their own accounts of them, whether fables or facts, have hitherto scarcely been adverted to by Sanskrit scholars. The subject is not of general interest; and requires a twofold qualification, not likely to be often combined, in the individual who embarks in it:—as it is also a matter more of curiosity than utility, there is little inducement to its prosecution. At the same time, vulgar errors are always mischievous, and their correction would in some sort repay the labour that should effect so salutary a purpose. There are no doubt, amongst the members of the medical profession in India, many competent to the task of giving to the world an accurate view of the Hindu systems; and it is not intended here to anticipate any part of their labours, in the few desultory notices we propose to offer, on the existence and history of Hindu Surgery.

The Āyur Veda, as the medical writings of highest antiquity and authority are collectively called, is considered to be a portion of the fourth or Atharva Veda, and is consequently the work of Brahmá—by him it was communicated to Daksha, the Prajapati, and by him the two Aświns*, or sons of Súrya, the Sun, were instructed in it, and they then became the medical attendants of the gods—a genealogy, that cannot fail recalling to us the two sons of Esculapius, and their descent from Apollo. Now what were the duties of the Aświns, according to Hindu authorities?—the gods, enjoying eternal youth and health, stood in no need of physicians, and consequently they held no such sinecure station. The wars between the gods and demons, however, and the conflicts amongst the gods themselves, in which wounds might be suffered, although death was not inflicted, required chirurgical aid—and it was this, accordingly, which the two Aswins rendered. They performed many extraordinary cures, as might have been expected from their superhuman character. When Brahmá's fifth head was cut off by Rudra, they replaced it—a feat worthy of their exalted rank in the profession to which they belong, and little capable of imitation by their unworthy successors.

The meaning of these legendary absurdities is clear enough, and is conformable to the tenor of all history. Man, in the semi-barbarous state, if not more subject to external injuries than internal disease, was at least more likely to seek remedies for the former, which were obvious to his senses, than to imagine the means of relieving the latter, whose nature he could so little comprehend.

Surgical, therefore, preceded medicinal skill; as Celsus has asserted, when commenting on Homer's account of Podalirius and Machaon, who were not consulted, he says, during the plague in the Grecian camp, although regularly employed to extract darts and heal wounds. The same position is maintained, as we shall hereafter see, by the Hindu writers, in plain, as well as in legendary language.

According to some authorities, the Aświns instructed Indra, and Indra was the preceptor of Dhanwantari; but others make Átreya, Bharadwája, and Charaka prior to the latter.—Charaka's work, which goes by his name, is extant.—Dhanwantari is also styled Káśírāja, prince of Káśí or Benares. His disciple was Suśruta, the son of Viśwamitra, and consequently a contemporary of Rāma: his work also exists, and is our chief guide at present. It is unquestionably of some antiquity, but it is not easy to form any conjecture of its real date, except that it cannot have the prodigious age, which Hindu fable assigns it—it is sufficient to know, that it is perhaps the oldest work on the subject, excepting that of Charaka, which the Hindus possess. One commentary on the text, made by Vágbhaṭṭa a Cashmirian, is probably as old as the twelfth or thirteenth century, and his comment, it is believed, was preceded by others. The work is divided into six portions—the Sūtra Sthāna, or Chirurgical Definitions; the Nidána Sthána, or section on Symptoms, or Diagnosis; Śaríra Sthána, anatomy; Chikitsá Sthána, the internal application of Medicines; Kalpa Sthána, Antidotes; Uttara Sthána, or a supplementary section on various local diseases, or affections of the eye, ear, &c.—In all these divisions, however, surgery, and not general medicine, is the object of the Sauśruta.

The Āyur Veda, which originally consisted of one hundred sections, of a thousand stanzas each, was adapted to the limited faculties and life of man, by its distribution into eight subdivisions, the enumeration of which conveys to us an accurate idea of the objects of the Ars medendi amongst the Hindus. The divisions are thus enumerated—1 Śālya. 2 Śālākya. 3 Kāya chikitsá. 4 Bhūtavidyá. 5 Kaunárabhṛitya. 6 Agada. 7 Rásáyana, and 8 Vájíkarāṇa—They are explained as follows:

1. Śālya is the art of extracting extraneous substances, whether of grass, wood, earth, metal, bone, &c. violently or accidentally introduced into the human body, with the treatment of the inflammation and suppuration thereby induced; and by analogy, the cure of all phlegmonoid tumours and abscesses. The word Śālya means a dart or arrow, and points clearly to the origin of this branch of Hindu science. In like manner the ῥατρός, or physician of the Greeks, was derived, according to Sextus Empiricus, from ῥός, an arrow or dart.

2. Śālākya is the treatment of external organic affections, or diseases of the eyes, ears, nose, &c.—it is derived from Śalākā, which means any thin and sharp instrument; and is either applicable in the same manner as Śalya to the active causes of the morbid state, or it is borrowed from the generic name of the slender probes and needles used in operations on the parts affected.

3. Kāya Chikitsā is, as the name implies, the application of the Ars medendi (Chikitsā) to the body in general (Kāya), and forms what we mean by the Science of Medicine—the two preceding divisions constitute the Surgery of modern schools.

4. Bhūtavidyā is the restoration of the faculties from a disorganised state induced by Demoniactal possession. This art has vanished before the diffusion of knowledge, but it formed a very important branch of medical practice, through all the schools, Greek, Arabic, or European, and descended to days very near our own, as a reference to Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy may prove to general readers.

5. Kaumāra bhritya means the care of infancy, comprehending not only the management of children from their birth, but the treatment of irregular lactic secretion, and puerperal disorders in mothers and nurses—this holds with us also the place that its importance claims.

6. Agada is the administration of antidotes—a subject which, as far as it rests upon scientific principles, is blended with our medicine and surgery.

7. Rāsāyana is chemistry, or more correctly alchemy, as the chief end of the chemical combinations it describes, and which are mostly metallurgic, is the discovery of the universal medicine—the elixir that was to render health permanent, and life perpetual.

8. The last branch, Vájíkarāṇa, professes to promote the increase of the human race—an illusory research, which, as well as the preceding, is not without its parallel in ancient, and modern times.

We have, therefore, included in these branches, all the real and fanciful pursuits of physicians of every time and place. Suśruta, however, confines his own work to the classes Śalya and Śálákya, or Surgery; although, by an arrangement not uncommon with our own writers, he introduces occasionally the treatment of general diseases, and the management of women and children, when discussing those topics to which they bear relation. Pure Surgery, however, is his aim, and it is the particular recommendation of Dhanwantari—Śalya being, he declares expressly, “the first and best of the medical sciences; less liable, than any other, to the fallacies of conjectural and inferential practice; pure in itself; perpetual in its applicability; the worthy produce of heaven, and certain source of fame.”

From these premises we may be satisfied, that Surgery was once extensively cultivated, and highly esteemed by the Hindus. Its rational principles and scientific practice are, however, now, it may be admitted, wholly unknown to them—what they formerly were, we may perhaps take some future opportunity of specifying.

INTRODUCTION TO THE MAHÁBHÁRATA, prefixed to Prof. F. JOHNSON'S "Selections from the Mahábhárata".

London: 1842,

and

TRANSLATION OF THREE EXTRACTS,

originally published in the Quarterly Oriental Magazine.

THE Mahábhárata and Rámáyána were designated by Sir William Jones the two epic poems of the Hindus. The appropriateness of the epithet has been denied by some of those ultra-admirers of Virgil and Homer, who will allow the dignity of the Epos to be claimed by none but the objects of their idolatry: and, in the restricted sense in which a poem is entitled epic, agreeably to the definition of Aristotle, it may indeed be matter of question, if the term be strictly applicable to the Hindu Poems. Although, however, it might not be impossible to vindicate their pretensions to such a title, yet it is not worth while to defend them. It matters little what they are called; and they will not lose their value, as interesting narratives of important events, as storehouses of historical traditions and mythological legends; as records of the ancient social and political condition of India, and as pictures of national manners, if, instead of epic, they be denominated heroic poems.

The Mahábhárata, then, is a heroic poem in eighteen "Parvas", Cantos or Books; which are said to contain 100,000 "ślokas" or stanzas. The printed edition contains 107,389 ślokas; but this comprises the supplement called Hari-vanśa, the stanzas of which are 16,374, and which is certainly not a part of the original Mahábhárata. There is reason to believe that the primary authentic poem was of a still more limited extent than it would reach even after the deduction; for it is said, in the first book, that, exclusive of its episodes, the poem consisted of 24,000 ślokas. Some of the episodes are equivocal additions; others spring naturally out of the business of the story; and many of them are, no doubt, of considerable antiquity.

The author of the poem is said to be Kṛishṇa Dwai-páyana, the "Vyása" or arranger of the Vedas, and the actual father of the two princes Páṇḍu and Dhṛitaráshṭra, whose progeny are the principal characters of the fable. He taught the work to his pupil Vaiśampáyana, who recited it at a great sacrifice celebrated by Janamejaya, the great-grandson of Arjuna, one of the heroes of the poem. As we have it, it is said to have been repeated by Sauti the son of Lomaharshana to the Rishis, or sages, assembled on occasion of a religious solemnity in the Naimisha Forest.

The subject of the Mahábhárata is a war for regal supremacy in India, between the sons of two brothers, Páñdu and Dhṛitaráshṭra. The sons of the former were five in number; Yudhishtíra, Bhíma, and Arjuna, by one of his wives, Príthá; and Nakula and Sahadeva by his other wife, Mádrí. Dhṛitaráshṭra had as numerous a family as King Priam: but they were all sons, with the addition of a single daughter. Of the hundred sons, Duryodhana was the eldest, and the foremost in hate and hostility to his cousins.

Although the elder of the two princes, Páñdu, "the Pale" (as the name denotes), was rendered by his palar (which may be suspected of intimating a leprous taint) incapable of succession. He was obliged therefore, to relinquish his claim to his brother; and retired to the Himálaya mountains, where his sons were born, and where he died. Upon his death, his sons, yet in their boyhood, were brought to Hástinapura by the religious associates of Páñdu's exile, and were introduced to Dhṛitaráshṭra as his nephews. Some doubts were at first expressed of the genuineness of their birth; and, in truth, they were the sons of Páñdu only by courtesy, being the children of his wives by sundry divinities. Thus Yudhishtíra was the son of Dharma, the god of justice, the Hindu Pluto: Bhíma, of Váyu, or god of the wind, the Indian Aeolus: Arjuna was the son of Indra, the god of the firmament, Jupiter Tonans: and Nakula and Sahadeva were the sons of two personages peculiar to Hindu mythology, their Dioscuri, twin-sons of the Sun, the Aświní-Kumáras.

As, however, Páñdu had acknowledged these princes as his own, the objection to their birth was overruled by his example; and the boys were taken under the guardianship of their uncle, and educated along with his sons.

The principal performers in the Mahábhárata are distinctively and consistently characterized. The sons of Páñdu, with the exception of Bhíma, are represented as moderate, generous, and just: and Bhíma is not ungenerous, although somewhat of a choleric temperament, and of overweening confidence in his hereulean strength. The sons of Dhṛitaráshṭra are described as envious, arrogant, and malignant: and this contrast of character enhances, even in boyhood, the feelings of animosity which the consciousness of incompatible inheritance has inspired.

The genealogical descent of the two families, the circumstances of the birth and education of the princes, their juvenile emulation and enmity, and the adventures of the Páñdavas when they attain adolescence, are narrated in the "Ádi Parva" or First Book. From this book, the first of the following selections, the Passage of Arms at Hástinapura, is extracted as illustrative of the spirit of rivalry which animated the young princes, and of some of the ancient usages of the Hindus. Subsequently to the transactions there described, the practices of the sons of Dhṛitaráshṭra against the lives of the Páñdavas become still more malevolent; and they privily set fire to the house in which Príthá and her sons reside. As the Páñdhavas had been warned of the intention of their enemies, they eluded it, and escaped by a subterranean passage, leaving it to be reported and believed that they had perished in the flames of their dwelling. They secrete themselves in the forests, and adopt the garb and mode of life of Brahmans. It is during this period that they hear of the "Swayamvara", a rite familiar to the readers of Nala, the choice of a husband by a princess from the midst of congregated suitors, of Draupadí, daughter of Drupada, King of the upper part of the Doáb; and they repair to his court, and win the lady. The circumstances of this exploit, and its immediate consequences, form the subject of the second of the following Selections.

The existence of the sons of Pándu having become generally known by the occurrences at the Swayamvara of Draupadí, King Dhṛitaráshtra was prevailed upon by his ministers to send for them, and to divide his sovereignty equally between them and his sons. The partition was accordingly made. Yudhishthira and his brethren reigned over a district on the Jamná, at their capital Indraprastha; and Duryodhana, with his brethren, were the Rájas of Hástinapura on the Ganges. The ruins of the latter city, it is said, are still to be traced on the banks of the Ganges*; whilst a part of the city of Delhi is still known by the name of Indraprastha. The contiguity of these two cities, and consequently of the principalities of which they were respectively the capitals, necessarily suggests the inference, that in the days of the Mahábhárata, as well as in later times, India was parcelled out amongst a number of petty independent sovereigns. This inference becomes certainty from the valuable specification which the poem contains of the very many Rájás who took part in the struggle in favour of one or other of the contending houses. This state of things, however, was not irreconcilable with the nominal supremacy of some one paramount lord: and after the partition of the kingdom of Hástinapura, a fresh source of envy and hatred springs up in the minds of the sons of Dhritaráshtra, from the pretensions of Yudhishtira to celebrate the "Rájasúya" solemnity—a sacrifice, at which princes officiate in menial capacities, and make presents in acknowledgments of submission. This forms the topic of the "Sabhá Parva", the Second Book of the Poem.

* [Lassen, Ind. Alt., I, 126.]

The claims of Yudhishtira to universal homage are preceded by the subjugation of the Powers of India by himself and his brothers. These conquests are merely predatory incursions, and are characteristic of the mode of warfare practised in India even in our own days in which the object of the Mahrattas, as of the Moguls before them, was commonly nominal submission, and the payment of tribute, varying in amount, according to the power of the superior to exact it, rather than the actual annexation of territory to their dominions. Sháh Álem was titular sovereign of India; and the coins were everywhere struck in his name, even after he was a captive in the hands of Sindhia, and a pensioner in those of the British Government. It does not follow, therefore, from the existence of a number of petty cotemporary princes, that there never was one, nominally at least, supreme monarch; nor is there the least incompatibility, in Indian history, between a sovereign ostensibly paramount, and numerous princes virtually independent. The notices of the countries subdued by the Páñdava princes, and the articles brought as tribute by the subjugated nations, furnish in this chapter much valuable and curious elucidation of the ancient civil and political circumstances and divisions of India.

Amongst the gaieties of the occasion, the sight of which embitters the animosity of the sons of Dhritarashtra, a diversion is insidiously proposed by them, which is the mainspring of all the subsequent mischief. The inveterate passion for play by which the early Hindus were inspired, as we learn from various parts of the Mahábhárata, as well as from other authorities, is a remarkable feature in the old national character. It is far from entirely obliterated, and it is as strong as ever amongst some others of the Eastern people: as the Malays, for instance, who, when they have lost every thing they possess, stake their families and themselves. So, in the gambling which ensues in the Mahábhárata, at what appears to be a kind of backgammon, where pieces are moved according to the cast of the dice, Yudhishtíra loses to Duryodhana his palace, his wealth, his kingdom, his wife, his brothers, and himself. Their liberty and possessions are restored by the interference of the old king Dhṛitaráshtra: but Yudhishtíra is again tempted to play; conditioning, that if he loses, he and his brothers shall pass twelve years in the forests, and shall spend the thirteenth year incognito. If discovered before the expiration of the year, they are to renew the whole term of their exile. He loses: and, with Draupadí and his brethren, goes into banishment, and lives the life of a forester. A description of the forest life of the Pándavas constitutes the topic of the Third Book, the "Vana Parva". Many episodes occur in this book: one of which is the story of Nala, which is recited to teach Yudhishtíra and his brethren resignation and hope. Another is the attempt of Jayadratha to carry off Draupadí by force which is the third of the following Selections.

At the expiration of the twelfth year, the Pándavas enter the service of King Viráta in different disguises. Their adventures are described in the "Viráta Parva", the Fourth Book. They acquire the esteem of the King; and when they make themselves known to him at the end of the thirteenth year, obtain his alliance to avenge their wrongs and vindicate their right of sovereignty.

The Fifth Book, the "Udyoga Parva", represents the preparations of the two parties for war, and enumerates the princes who enter into alliance with them. Amongst these is Kṛishná, the ruler of Dwáraká, and an incarnation of Vishnú. He is related by birth to both families, and professes a reluctance to join either; but prescient of what is to happen, he proposes to Duryodhana the choice between his individual aid and the co-operation of an immense army. Duryodhana unwisely prefers the latter; and Kṛishná, himself more than a host, becomes the ally of the Pándavas, the charioteer of his especial friend and favourite Arjuna, and the principal instrument of the triumph of his allies.

The four following Books are devoted to descriptive details of the battles which take place. Some of these are very Homeric; but, in general, the interest of the narrative is injured by repetition, and the battles are spoiled by the introduction of supernatural weapons, which leave little credit to the hero who vanquishes by their employment. The armies of Duryodhana are commanded in succession by Bhíshma his great-uncle, Droṇa his military preceptor, Karṇa the King of Anga, his friend, and Śalya the King of Madra, his ally: and the description of their operations is contained in as many Parvas, named after them "Droṇa-Parva" &c. These chiefs, and many others, are slain at the close of their commands; and in the Ninth or "Śalya-Parva", Duryodhana himself is killed by Bhíma in single combat with maces, in the use of which weapon they are both represented as excelling. A few of the surviving chiefs on the side of Duryodhana attempt to avenge the destruction of their friends by a night attack on the camp of the Pándavas, as narrated in the Tenth, or "Sauptika Parva". The attack is repelled chiefly by the metely assistance of Kṛishṇa.

A short Book, "the Strī Parva", describes the grief and lamentations of the women of either party over the slain, and the sorrow and anger of the old king Dhṛitarāshṭra. Yudhishtira himself gives way to poignant regret for what has passed: and the next Book, the "Śānti Parva" or "Chapter of Consolation", details, with more than sufficient diffuseness, the duties of Kings, the efficacy of liberality, and the means of obtaining final emancipation from existence. Hence the sections of this Parva are entitled "Rāja-dharma", "Dāna-dharma", and "Moksha-dharma" Parvas, or more properly "Upaparvas", minor cantos. The Thirteenth Book, the "Anuśāsana Parva", is a long and prolix series of discourses upon the duties of society, as communicated by Bhīshma, whilst about to die, to Yudhishtira. In this, as well as in the sections of the "Śānti Parva", the didactic portions are enlivened by appropriate tales and fables: each of the Books contains many sound doctrines and interesting illustrations, although both are somewhat misplaced in a narrative heroic poem.

The remaining Books of the Mahābhārata, although more or less episodical, are in better keeping with the story. They are also short, and hasten to the catastrophe. The Fourteenth or "Áśwamedhika Parva" describes the celebration of the "Áśwamedha" rite—the sacrifice of a horse, by Yudhishtira, in proof of his supremacy. In the Fifteenth Book, the "Áśrama Parva", King Dhṛitaráshṭra, with his queen Gándhārī and his ministers, retires to a hermitage, and obtains felicity or dies. The Sixteenth or "Mausala Parva" narrates the destruction of the whole Yádava race, the death of Kṛishná, who was one of the tribe, and the submersion of his capital Dwáráká by the ocean. The Seventeenth Book, called the "Maháprasthánika" or "Great journey", witnesses the abdication of his hardly-won throne by Yudhishtíra, and the departure of himself, his brothers, and Draupadí, to the Himálaya, on their way to the holy mountain Meru. As they proceed, the influence of former evil deeds proves fatal, and each in succession drops dead by the way-side: until Yudhishtíra, and a dog that had followed them from Hástinapura, are the only survivors. Indra comes to convey the prince to Swarga, or Indra's heaven; but Yudhishtíra refuses to go thither, unless admitted to that equal sky,

His faithful dog shall bear him company;

and Indra is obliged to comply.

The Eighteenth Book, the "Swargárohaṇa", introduces Yudhishtíra in his bodily form to heaven. To his great dismay, he finds there Duryodhana and the other sons of Dhṛitaráshṭra; but sees none of his own friends, his brothers, or Draupadí. He demands to know where they are, and refuses to stay in Swarga without them. A messenger of the gods is sent to shew him where his friends are, and leads him to the "fauces graveolentis Averni", where he encounters all sorts of disgusting and terrific objects. His first impression is, to turn back; but he is arrested by the wailings of well-remembered voices, imploring him to remain, as his presence has already alleviated their tortures. He overcomes his repugnance, and resolves to share the fate of his friends in hell, rather than abide with their enemies in heaven. This is his crowning trial. The gods come, and applaud his disinterested virtue. All the horrors that had formerly beset his path vanish; and his friends and kindred are raised along with him to Swarga where they become again the celestial personages that they originally were, and which they had ceased to be for a season, in order to descend along with Kṛishṇa in human forms amongst mankind, and co-operate with him in relieving the world from the tyranny of those evil beings, who were oppressing the virtuous and propagating impiety, in the characters of Duryodhana, his brothers, and their allies.

The Hari-vanśa is a sort of Supplement to the Mahábhárata. It professes to give an account of the genealogy of Hari or Vishṇu, in the character of Kṛishṇa; but adds to it genealogical details, the narrative of Kṛishṇa's exploits, and a variety of legends and tales tending to recommend the worship of the demi-god. The internal evidence is strongly indicative of a date considerably subsequent to that of the major portion of the Mahábhárata. It has been translated into French by M. Langlois, and the translation has been published by the Oriental Translation Committee.

The text of the Mahábhárata has been printed at Calcutta, in four quarto volumes. The work was commenced by the Committee of Public Instruction, and completed by the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

The great extent of the work, and the tediousness of much of its contents, preclude the prospect of its ever being translated throughout; though, as a monument of Hindu antiquity, it merits entire translation. Although, however, we can scarcely expect a translation of the whole, yet very many portions of it well deserve to be rendered into some of the languages of Europe. Something of translation in detail has already been effected. The late Sir Charles Wilkins led the way, by his translation of the “Bhagavad Gítá”, which is an episode of the “Bhíshma Parva”. Part of the opening of the first “Parva”, rendered into English, it is believed, by Sir C. Wilkins, is published in the “Annals of Oriental Literature”. Professor Bopp has also published the “Nalus”, the “Diluvium”, the Journey of Arjuna, the “Story of Sávitrí”, and the “Rape of Draupadí”, with translations in Latin and German; and the first of these has assumed an English garb, from the distinguished pen of the Rev. H. Milman, in which surpassing grace of style is combined with extraordinary faithfulness, both to the letter, and the spirit of the original poem. As contributing to elucidate the ancient geography of India, a portion containing the enumeration of a variety of countries has been translated and illustrated by the writer, and incorporated in the pages of the Vishnú Purána: and the illustration of ancient India, derivable from the Mahábhárata, is in course of very careful and learned prosecution by Professor Lassen of Bonn, in a series of valuable dissertations published in the Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes. By these means, the merits, both poetical and historical, of the Mahábhárata are becoming more extensively known: but in the amplitude of its extent, in the numerous traditions, legends and tales which it contains, and in its many didactic and philosophical passages, it offers an accumulation of materials adapted to different tastes, and auxiliary to diverging researches, which must long advantageously engage the attention, and reward the industry, of Sanskrit scholars.

FIRST DAY'S BATTLE.

[Book VII, c. 14—16.]

The Kuru¹ host entrusted to his care,

¹ Kuru, it is usually supposed, is the prince who gives the designation to Duryodhana and his brothers, thence called Kauravas, in opposition to their cousins, the sons of Pándu, termed Pándavas, Kuru being a remote ancestor of both. The Mahábhárata, however, gives a different account, and derives the term Kaurava from the country, Kuru-jánga, or Kurukshetra [Lassen, Ind. Alt. I, 593.], which was subject to the family of Duryodhana, the upper part of the Panjáb beyond Dehli, or Panniput, which is still commonly called by the Hindus Kurukhetr. — Kuru, the prince, was descended from Nahusha, the great grandson of Soma,

The son of Bharadwája¹ marshals; first or the moon, by his grandson Puru. The thirteenth descendant of Kuru was Śantanu, who had four sons, Bhishma, Chitrāngada, Vichitravírya, and Vyása. Of these, Bhishma and Vyása lived unmarried, and Chitrāngada and Vichitravírya both died without offspring; on which, to prevent the extinction of the family, and conformably to the ancient Hindu law, Vyása begot offspring on his brother's widows. The sons were Dhítarāshtra and Pándu. Dhítarāshtra had a hundred sons by Gándhári, the princess of Gaudhára, of whom Duryodhana was the eldest. Pándu had five sons, the celebrated princes Yudhishtira, Bhíma or Bhimasena, Arjuna, and the twin brothers Nakula and Sahadeva. Of these the first was remarkable for his piety and integrity; the second for his gigantic bulk and strength. Arjuna was eminent for his valour, and was the particular friend of Kṛishṇa.

² The horse of Kamboja are the troops of Khorasan, Balkh, and Bokhara. [Vishú Pur., p. 194. Lassen, I, 439.]

³ The Śakas are the Sakai, or Sacæ of the ancients, some of the Scythian, that is, the Nomadic races of Turkestan and Tartary.

⁵ These are named in the original the people of Trigartta, the Ambashthas, Múlavas, Śivis, Sauviras, Śúrasenas, Śúdras, &c. Several of them are traceable in classical geography.

⁶ Duryodhana, the eldest son of Dhritarashtra.

⁷ Karṇa was the half brother of the Pándavas, being the son

Exulting in their sovereign's stately stature,
 High raised upon his elephant of war,
 And gorgeous shining as the rising sun.
 His warriors deemed the gods themselves were weak,
 With Indra at their head, to stem his prowess,
 And each to each their thoughts revealed, they moved,
 Secure of victory, to meet the foe.

The sons of Pándu marked the coming storm,
 And swift arrayed their force. The chief divine¹ of Prithá, the princess of Śúrasena, before her marriage to Pándu, by the Sun; this lady being presented by the saint Durvásas with a charm, by which she could compel any god she pleased to her embraces—a power she did not suffer to lie idle. Afraid of discovery, Prithá cast the infant into the Jamná, where he was found by Rádhá, the wife of Śatánanda, the charioteer of Dhritaráshtra. The king adopted the boy, and brought him up with his own sons; and subsequently Duryodhana gave him the kingdom of Anga, and after Kansa's death that of Mathurá. Kárna, therefore, adheres to his adoptive, in preference to his natural brothers. He is one of the most distinguished amongst the Kuru champions. Although placed in the van, no particular mention is here made of his exploits, probably because the poet has dedicated to them an entire canto, the next, called the Kárna Parva. Kárna is killed by Arjuna.

² A name of Arjuna, the third of the Pándava princes, "the conqueror of wealth".

³ Arjuna's banner bore a figure of Hanumán. Having propitiated that monkey demigod, he was desired to ask a boon, on which he solicited Hanumán's personal aid in battle. He was told

The host's conducting star, the guiding light
 That cheered the bravest heart, and as it swept
 The air, it warmed each breast with martial fires.
 Before the ranks the prince impelled his car,
 By Vāsudeva, of created things¹
 Supremest, driven; and as he sternly grasped
 His massy bow Gāṇḍīva², he appeared,
 The formidable minister of fate.

Now as on either hand the hosts advanced,
 A sudden tumult filled the sky: earth shook:
 Chafed by wild winds, the sands upcurled to heaven,
 And spread a veil before the sun. Blood fell
 In showers, shrill screaming kites and vultures winged
 The darkling air, whilst howling jackals hung
 Around the march, impatient for their meal;
 And ever and anon the thunder roared,
 And angry lightnings flashed across the gloom,
 Or blazing meteors fearful shot to earth.

Regardless of these awful signs, the chiefs
 Pressed on to mutual slaughter, and the peal
 Of shouting hosts comingling shook the world.

to mount the monkey's figure on his banner, which would answer as well.

¹ The best of all things that have been, Śreshṭha Bhútānām, or the best of all elementary things. In either case, however, the expression is not equivalent to the assertion of a divine nature. Vāsudeva is the patronymic of Kṛishṇa.

² Gāṇḍīva is the name of Arjuna's bow; the Hindu writers, like our bards of chivalry, giving appellations to the favourite weapons of their chief heroes.

Contending warriors, emulous for victory,
 And great in arms, wielded the sharp-edged sword,
 And hurled the javelin; frequent flew the dart,
 And countless arrows canopied the combat.
 Against the leader of the Kuru force
 The Páñdu chiefs their clustering cohorts urged;
 But soon the bands were broken by his prowess,
 Like clouds that scattering fly before the gale.
 Next felt the force of Srinjaya his might,
 And shrunk from his encounter, like the Titans
 From Indra's valour. To their succour came Panchála's sons, by Dhṛishtadyumna¹ led.
 A momentary check the veteran troops
 That followed Droṇa from the shock sustained;
 But soon his skill the cohorts re-arrayed,
 Revived their hopes, and roused them to redeem
 Their fame. The foe in turn arrested paused,
 And fled in fear, like deer before the lion.
 The victors chased, and circling in pursuit,
 As in a fiery circle, hemmed them round.
 Before the rest rode Droṇa on his car,
 By art immortal framed—the banners stood
 Unwaving as they rapid met the breeze;

¹ Dhṛishtadyumna is the brother of Draupadī, the son of Drupada, king of Panchála, which appears to designate a country between Dehli and the Panjáb, but descending to the south as low as to Márwár, or Ajmír, being bounded in that direction, if the author of the Mahábhárata is not mistaken, by the Charmanvatí, or Chumbul. [Lassen, I, 601.]

Swift plunged the bounding steeds amidst the throng,
And terror hovered o'er the warrior's course.

When Yudhishthira¹ marked the fearful rout,
And broken cars, and elephants, and steeds,
And men, that strewed the sanguinary plain,
He called his brother Arjuna to lead
His choicest squadrons to restore the day.
The generous youth obeyed him: followed fast
The five brave brothers of Kaikeya's realm,
Śikhaṇḍi², Dhṛishtadyumna, and the son
Of fair Subhadra³: next came mighty Bhīma⁴, Ghatotkacha⁵ his son, half fiendish born;

¹ Yudhishthira, the firm in war, the eldest of the Pándava princes: he is also called Dharmarāja, the pious prince, Dharma-putra, the son of Dharma.

² Kaikeya, a country and a prince so named. The monarch's five sons assisted the Pándavas, as he was also the father-in-law of Kṛishṇa. His name in the Bhāgavata [IX, 24, 37.] occurs, Dhṛishtaketu.

³ Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna by Subhadra, the sister of Kṛishṇa.

⁴ Bhīma, or Bhīmasena, the third of the Pándava princes. In his youth he was carried to Pátála, the subterranean habitation of the serpent demigods, and was given a beverage which conferred upon him enormous and gigantic strength.

⁵ Ghatotkacha was the son of Bhīma by a Rákshasī, or female fiend, Hidimbā, whose brother he slew. The scene of these transactions was on the east of the Ganges, and the Rákshasī may therefore mean a princess of some of the bordering tribes east of Hindustan, or between Bhote and Ava; all of whom, eating meat and following other impure practices, might well be considered Rákshasas, or "cannibals", by the Hindus. Heramba is in

The sons of Drupada, and Dhṛishṭaketu¹,
 And Chekitána², and the martial³ twins,
 And the brave monarch⁴ of the Pándu race.
 These all, and more, came flocking to the fight.
 Such were their deeds, as their high birth became,
 And name in arms, and Bharadhwāja's son
 Was stopped in his career. Awhile he paused—
 Rose in his car—he cast his eyes around,
 Glowing with rage, then furious rushed amidst
 The adverse host, as bursts the roaring gale
 Amongst the vollied clouds, and over men,
 And steeds, and cars he forced his headlong way,
 Borne by his coursers, rapid as the breeze,
 And stained a red still ruddier than their own,
 As wading onwards midst the plashy gore.
 Forgot his years, the veteran chieftain, fired
 With rage, the energy of youth resumed:
 Amidst the Pándu ranks he smote resistless,
 And many a headless corse, and mangled limb, fact applied geographically to designate the western portion of Asam. Ghatotkacha was slain by Karna. See the passage descriptive of his death. As. Res. Vol. XIII, p. 170. [Lassen. I, 663. III, 471.]

¹ Dhṛishṭaketu here is probably the son of Dhṛishṭadyumna, and a prince of Panchála. He commanded, however, the troops of Chedi, or Chandail, and Málwá.

² Chekitána was a king, but of what part of India we are not apprized.

³ Nakula and Sahadeva, the two youngest of the Pándavas, the sons of Pándu's second wife, Mádri, by the Aświni Kumáras.

⁴ Yudhisṭhira.

And car deserted, marked the warrior's path.
Fast flew his arrows with unerring aim,
And heaven loud echoed to his rattling bow.
The soil was soddened with the crimson stream
Of the vast numbers, men, and steeds, and elephants, Whom Droṇa's shafts to Yama's halls consigned.

And Yudhishthira feared. His fears observed
His noble brother Arjuna: he soothed
The monarch's terror, and with solemn vow
Plighted his faith to brave the arm of Droṇa,
And fall or triumph—to his vow the drums,
And trumpets, and hoarse sounding shells replied.
The animating notes recalled the chiefs
Who shrunk from conflict, and the shouting throng,
Rending heaven's concave with their clamours, rushed
Again to face the perils of the war.

Collected thus the Pándavas opposed
The veteran chief, whilst to his aid there came
The noblest of the Kuru bands: first Śakuni Against the youthful Sahadeva aimed
His shafts, and levelled prostrate on the plain
His charioteer and banner—nor unscathed
Launched he his arrows; in the shock his steeds
And car were crushed, and from his hand the bow
Was wrested. On the ground, he foaming sprang,
And whirled on high his ponderous mace—on foot
The warriors, like two towering mountains, met.
The shafts of Droṇa fierce Panchála's king
Struck from his chariot. Bhíma hurled his darts

Impetuous on Vivimsatí¹: unbowed
 The hero stood, and all the warriors praised
 The strength that foiled the giant. Furious, Bhíma Dashed with his club the coursers to the earth;
 Composed the prince leapt forth, and either chief,
 Like a wild elephant, defied his foe.
 Then Śalya², as in sportive mood, transfixed
 The banner and the charioteer of Nakula.
 An iron dart, by Sátyaki³ propelled,
 Gored Kṛitavarmá's⁴ breast—he of the wound
 Regardless, on the son of Śini hurled
 His frequent shafts. High on a stately car
 Swift borne by generous coursers to the fight,
 The vaunting son of Púru⁵ proudly drove,

² Śalya was king of Madra, a country on the north-west confines of India, apparently about Ghizni and Gor, and the site of the ancient Mardi, who were well known to classical writers as a warlike and savage race. Buchanan apparently has strangely erred in placing this country in Bhoján.

³ The son of Satyaka, a prince of the lunar line, and of the house of Yadu, apparently the same with Yuyudhána. He is properly the grandson of Śini.

⁵ Paurava, or son of Púru; but a more particular definition of this person is wanting. He is called in another section a powerful prince.

Secure of conquest, on Subhadrá's son.

The youthful champion shrunk not from the contest:
As bounds the lion's cub upon the elephant,
The gallant boy sprang fierce upon the chief
The royal shade and flaunting banner fell;
And now himself had perished, but his dart
With timely aim the bow of Abhimanyu
Struck into pieces—from his tingling hand
The youthful warrior cast the fragments off,
And drew his sword, and grasped his iron-bound shield.

Upon the car of Paurava he leapt,
And seized the chief—his charioteer he slew,
And dragged the monarch senseless o'er the field.
Above the prostrate prince he stood triumphant,
As o'er the slaughtered bull the lion strides.
The Kuru princes marked their friend's disgrace,
And Jayadratha¹, burning for revenge,
Alighted from his chariot, and defied
The son of Arjuna to nobler combat.
The youth obeyed the call; he left his prize,
Sprang from his car, and stood awhile exposed Unsheltered to a shower of darts and spears
From circling foes, but by his active sword,
Asunder cloven, or his shield repelled.

¹ Jayadratha brought to the field the troops of Sindhu, or Sind, and the Sauvīras. His father Vṛiddhakshetra had been killed by Arjuna, the father of Abhimanyu, with whom, therefore, he had a debt of vengeance to settle. He had also been an unsuccessful suitor for the hand of Draupadī.

The warriors met—revenge and glory fired
Their hearts, and old hereditary hate :
Such was the strife, as when the tiger braves
The lion's prowess. Blows incessant rained
From either arm, nor pause nor rest they knew,
Nor vantage gained, nor bated of their fury.
At length Saubhadra's side exposed, his foe
With deadly aim assailed—assailed in vain;
The heavenly tempered arms repelled the stroke,
And into fragments flew the brittle steel.
Reft of his sword, the king of Sindhu sprang
Back from the field, and instant on his car
Securely stood—his chieftains closed around,
And in firm phalanx saved their recreant lord.
In vain the son of Arjuna defied
The monarch to the fight, or strove to pierce
The serried bands—in wrath he turned away,
And carried death and terror o'er the plain.

As on he passed, the king of Madra marked
His course, and at the prince infuriate launched
His javelin, chased with gold;—but as the son
Of Vinatá upon the flying snake
Unfailing darts, so Abhimanyu seized
The lance, and hurled it at its lord again;
With happier aim—the luckless charioteer
Received its weighty barb, and gasped in death.
Loud Śalya raved, and armed with iron mace,
Swift left his car—nor feared the youth his prowess;
But Bhíma stepped between, nor deemed his years

Fit match for Śalya's might, the worthy peer
Of his own giant strength. Onward he moved
To meet the king, and pleased the monarch marked
A coming foe that would not shame his valour.
On either side the anxious hosts beheld
The warrior pair, and loud the trumpets blew,
And echoing clamours heralded the conflict.
For who of all the Kuru bands but Śalya
The force of Bhímasena could encounter?
And who amongst the Páñdus could oppose,
Save Bhímasen, the might of Madra's king?
Each chieftain raised a ponderous iron mace,
Studded with spikes, and gorgeous set with gold;
And as they circled rapid through the air,
Like flashing lightning gleamed the whirling weapons.
Fierce as two savage bulls the chieftains stood Opposed, nor long delayed the interchange
Of deadly blows. As met the clashing iron,
Fast from the stroke the fiery flashes flew,
And radiant splinters sparkled round the head
Of each tall champion, like a glittering swarm
Of fire-flies round some venerable tree.
From the deep gashes trickling torrents ran;
And like the Kinsúka¹, when thickly set
With vermil blossoms, glowed each warrior form.
Unshaken as a mountain, Bhíma bore
The rain of blows: with like unyielding strength
The Madra king sustained the mace of Bhíma;

¹ A tree that bears blood-red flowers, (Butea frondosa).

Like a tall rock, whose base is rooted firm, Though frequent thunder-strokes have scarred its summit.

To gain the vantage of the fight intent,
Their practised skill the combatants display :
Alternate they advance, retire, or move,
In circling round—ten paces they retreat,
Then rush like butting elephants together.
At last, concentrating all their strength, they struck ;
And both, like Indra's banners by the storm
Uprooted, fell. When Kṛitavarmá saw
The king of Madra senseless on the earth,
He urged his troops to aid, and in the instant
The fainting warrior to his car they bore.
Reeled though his brain, as he had deeply quaffed
The wine cup, Bhíma in a moment rose.
With rage he maddened, when he saw the foe
Escaped his vengeance, and in vain he called
The king of Madra to renew the war.
The sons of Páṇḍu with redoubling shouts,
And mingled clang of horn, and drum, and shell, Proclaimed their joy, and hailed their champion's triumph.

The Kuru host disheartened when he saw,
The son of Karna, valiant Vṛishasena,
Foremost to rally strove, and with his shafts,
Thick darting as the solar rays, he hurled
The Páṇḍu warriors to the shades of hell.
Like trees uprooted by the gale, they strewed
The field. The Kuru bands their hopes resumed,

And ardent sought the war—their kindling fires
 Their veteran leader fanned, and led them on Against the monarch of the adverse host.
 Fierce in their van his chariot Droṇa urged
 Full on Yudhishtira, and with a shaft
 Struck from his grasp his bow. The noble Arjuna, Encouraging his brave Panchála guard,
 Stood fearless by his brother, and repelled
 Unmoved the shock, as breasts some ample stream,
 And reflux drives, the waters of the main.
 Still Droṇa strove—across his threatening course
 The valiant Yugandhara¹ daring rushed,
 As blows a gale athwart the angry deep.
 A spear dislodged him from his car, and doomed
 His soul to Yama's dwelling. Droṇa next
 With fatal shaft the head of Sinhasena
 Lopped from the trunk—then flew his weighty lance
 At Vyághradatta²—in the breast infixed
 The weapon quivered, and the hero fell.
 Such deeds appalled the Páṇḍavas; they cried,
 This day to Dhṛitaráshtra's sons gives victory:
 A moment more, and their resistless chief
 Shall captive lead our king. Yet not the less
 They closed around; and Arjuna exclaimed,
 Fear not, my friends, still, still your fame maintain.
 So speaking, on he dashed with whirring wheel

² We cannot pretend to give any satisfactory account of this person, or the preceding victim of Droṇa's exploits.

Through the deep streams of blood, with carcasses
And shattered weapons choaked, and thundering drove

Against the Kuru ranks. Around his course
In clouds the arrows flew, and darkened earth
And heaven, and hid the combatants from sight.
Precursor of nocturnal shades; for now
The sun behind the western mountains sunk,
And gloom profound ensued, nor friend nor foe
Could longer be distinguished. Droṇa then Commanded conflict cease, and Arjuna Restrained his now re-animated troops.
Each to their tents withdrew. Amidst his peers
The glorious Arjuna unrivalled shone,
As gleams the moon amongst the stars of heaven.

End of the first day's Battle.

From the Oriental Quarterly Magazine, Vol. III (March 1825), p. 134—44.

THE PASSAGE OF ARMS AT HÁSTINAPURA.

From the first book of the Mahábhárata [c. 130—136].

Now prudent¹ Bhíshma deemed the time arrived,
When the brave scions of each royal house,

¹ Bhíshma was the son of Śántanu by Gangá, he was the paternal uncle of Dhṛitaráshṭra, and as the Prince was blind, he acted as Regent during the minority of his grand nephews: he

Of Kuru and of Pándu, should improve
 Their growing years in exercise of arms.
 With sage deliberation long he scanned
 A suitable preceptor for their youth,
 Who to meet skill in war and arms should join
 Intelligence and learning, lofty aims,
 Religious earnestness and love of truth.
 And such in Droṇa Bharadwája's son,
 Wise, brave and pious did Gángeya¹ find.
 Revered as his high fame and rank demanded,
 Well pleased assented Droṇa to the charge,
 And by his cares the gallant sons of Pándu
 And Kuru's princely heirs were quickly trained In arms and warlike practice, as became
 Their martial origin and regal birth.

Where Gangá² from her mountain portal issues,
 Dwelt Bharadwája, a most holy sage;
 Who penance plied through many a painful year:
 Nor did he softer sentiments disdain.
 For, viewing sportive in the cooling stream
 A beauteous nymph of heaven, he owned the force
 Of charms celestial, and confessed desire.

disapproved of the conduct of Duryodhana towards his cousins, but when the war broke out, sided as a matter of duty with the Kuru Princes; he was killed early in the conflict: at the period in the text both they and the Pándava youths were equally under his care.

¹ Gángeya a name of Bhishma, the son of Gangá.

² Gangúdwára or Haridwára, the gate of Gangá or of Vishnú.

Hence Droṇa sprang—his tenderest youth was taught
Lessons of wisdom from his saintly sire,
Nor less in arms instructed by the son
Of Fire¹, his father's faithful friend, directed
To wield the blazing² shafts with fatal aim—
His lessons and his sports the royal heir
Of Prishat shared—alike the sage's charge
In friendship for the father, and in hope
That like regard should mutual bind the sons.

When unto man's estate the youthful pair
Arrived, their fortunes Sundered them. The king
Relinquished life and throne, and Drupada
The powerful sceptre of Panchála³ swayed:
Next Droṇa wept his holy sire exalted

¹ Agniveśa is the name of this individual, who is known by few other circumstances; a work on medicine is ascribed to him. [Weber, Catal. der Sanskrithandschriften, No. 940. 41. 47.]

² The Ágneya Astra, the weapon of fire, a musket or match-lock if our readers will, although we are afraid, our text intends something more visionary. [Sir H. Elliot's Bibliogr. Index to the Historians of Muhammedan Indian. Calc. 1849, p. 359-64. 373 f.]

³ The kingdom of Panchála seems to have occupied part of Oude, the lower Doáb and Agra; it could not have extended far in the latter direction, as Mathurá was the seat of an independent principality, whilst the states of Benares and Magadha must have pressed closely on its southern limits. [Lassen, Ind. Alt. I, 602. St. Julien, Mémoires sur les contrées occidentales, II, 348 f.] It may be doubted whether Kanoj was a distinct state at the period of the Mahábhárata. Panchála is said to derive its name from the five (Pancha) sons of Haryáséwa; Mudgala, Sfinjaya,

To heavenly regions from a transient world.
 He wedded, so his father had ordained,
 The virtuous Kṛipá¹, from whose bosom sprang
 The mighty Áswatthámá²—him to rear
 To virtue and to glory strove the sage,
 The pleasing task absorbing all the thoughts,
 That holy rites and pious duties spared.

The wrathful son of Jamadagni³ closed

Vṛihadishu, Pravira and Kámpilya, whom their father declared able(alam) to rule the kingdom. Vishnú Purána [p. 454]. The Panchálas as well as the Kauravas were of the family of Púru—descending immediately from Ajámídha. Ajámídha had several sons of whom the elder was Ríksha the father of Samvaraṇa, the father of Kuru; the younger was Níla, according to the Vishnú Purána [p. 453. 5]. The Mahábhárata differs in the name, but adds that the Panchála branch expelled the elder branch from Hástinapura, and obliged Samvaraṇa to retire to the Indus; his son Kuru, however, returned to a more westerly direction, and having established himself in the woods above Delhi, thence called from him Kurukshetra or Kurujāngala, finally recovered his ancient patrimony.

¹ Kṛipa and his sister Kṛipá were the children of Śatadhṛiti, a descendant of the Panchála branch of the Kuru family [but, according to the Mahábh. I, 5074 ff., of Śaradwat. Lassen, II, 598 f.]: they were exposed in their infancy in a thicket of Śara grass, where they were found by Śántanu, who took them home and reared them as his own.

² So named it is said from his making a noise at his birth as sturdily as a horse, (aśwa, a horse and stháma, sound,) a better etymology however is aśwa a horse, and stháma strength. [Mahábhárata I, 5115. 16.]

³ Jamadagni was a pious ascetic descended from Bhṛigu: amongst the fruits of his penance was the possession of the divine cow from whom all that was desired was obtained: by her aid

His dread career, now satiate with revenge,
 And bounteous on the priestly tribe bestowed
 The boundless treasures of the Kshatriya slain—
 Nought for himself reserved, as all he sought
 Was heavenly knowledge and the hermit's cell.
 Droṇa amongst the Brahman race preferred
 His suit and followed by a numerous train
 Of pious scholars travelled from his home
 To mount Mahendra, where the hero sage,
 The son of Bhṛigu, eminent in wisdom

he entertained the monarch Kártavírya and his train: the King was desirous of obtaining so valuable an animal, and as the Muni refused to part with her, he attempted to carry her off by force: in this he failed, as the cow who had a voice of her own in the business flew to heaven, but her pious master lost his life; his son Paraśuráma vowed in revenge to exterminate the Kshatriya race, and this he effected in twenty-one successful attacks upon them: he then gave the earth to the Bráhmaṇas. The story is apparently an allegorical account of a struggle for the sovereignty of India between the military and priestly castes. Paraśuráma is the seventh descent of Vishnú. In consequence of sparing some of the Kshatriya women who became wives of the Bráhmaṇas, the military tribe was suffered to revive: we may suppose

——in Ráma's reign,

Such mixture was not held a stain, as otherwise the great Rámachandra, Kṛishṇa, and all the heroes of the Mahábhárata would be no better than of the Varṇa Sankara, mixed and degraded castes. The Brahmans treated their benefactor with great ingratitude and allowed him to call no part of all the earth his own, upon which he repaired to the Malabar coast and commanded the sea to withdraw as far as he could fling his hatchet: this was done and he obtained a domicile in the present land of the Nairs—whence for a long time the legend says the Brahmans were utterly excluded.

As irresistible in war, sojourned.
His name and lineage known, the warrior gave Kind greeting to his guest, and bade him speak
His wish, secure he could not speak in vain.
Exhaustless wealth was Droṇa's seeming suit,
Though different purpose lurked beneath his prayer—
Ráma replied, whate'er of costly gems
Or gold was made my spoil, I have bestowed
On Brahma's sons; and upon Kaśyapa
The sea girt earth and all her smiling towns
Have I conferred: there but remain myself
And heavenly arms, chuse between them and me;
I chuse the weapons, Droṇa cried, but scant
My skill to wield them, give me that, and all
I seek is granted; Ráma smiled assent,
And from his lessons quickly Droṇa caught
The needful art. Contented then the sage Departed from Mahendra and repaired
To share the boon with Prishat's regal son,
The friend and fellow of his earliest years.

Soon in the presence of Panchála's King
Heedless of ceremony, Droṇa hailed
The haughty Drupada, "Behold in me
Your friend" he cried, the monarch sternly viewed
The sage and bent his brows, and with disdain
His eyeballs reddened: silent awhile he sat,
Then arrogantly spoke: Brahman, methinks
Thou shewest little wisdom or the sense
Of what is fitting when thou call'st me friend.

What friendship, weak of judgment, can subsist
 Between a luckless pauper and a king—
 Grant that such bond did formerly unite us,
 What then: with age it wanes and feels decay—
 Think not that everlasting friendship dwells
 In human hearts, the hand of time impairs
 Its strength, and passion plucks it from the bosom.
 And whom does Friendship but as equals join
 Such as we once might be, but are no more?
 The poor and rich, the ignorant and wise,
 The brave and recreant never can be friends.
 Those who in wealth compete or in like rank
 Exalted move acknowledge mutual worth:
 The learned Brahman cannot know esteem
 For him to whom the Vedas are a mystery:
 The warrior scorns the man who cannot guide
 The rattling chariot through the ranks of war;
 And he to whose high mandate nations bow
 Disdains to stoop to friends beneath the throne.
 Hence then with idle dreams, dismiss the memory
 Of other days and thoughts—I know thee not.”¹
 Struck with amaze, a moment Droṇa paused,
 Then turned away nor vouchsafed a reply—
 He left the city and indignant sought
 The stately capital that from the elephant,
 Derives its name², the seat of Kuru’s sons.

¹ Drupada had cause to repent this, Droṇa with his scholars invading Panchála and completely subduing it. Drupada’s daughter, thence named Draupadī, became the wife of the five Páṇḍavas.

² Nágákhya, also Gajákhya meaning the same. Hástinapura

Not long unknown the mighty master dwelt
 Within the capital, when Bhíshma heard
 The tale, and for his nephews sought his aid.
 The palace was his home, and all, the realm
 Of cost produced, was placed at his command:
 Thus honoured, pleased he trained the princely cohort

To martial excellence: quick spread his fame
 To other climes and from all regions gathered Illustrious youth, and with the heirs of Kuru
 And Pándu's sons the hopes of Vrishní's line
 And sons of Andhaka¹ partook his lessons.

But all the blooming troop in warrior skill,
 And gallant bearing, Arjuna² surpassed:
 Like him none reined the steed, guided the elephant,
 Or drove the chariot; none unyielding stood,
 The battle onset on the level plain:
 And none, with like dexterity or vigour
 Opposed in single fight his practised arm,
 Whether he launched the javelin, hurled the dart, means probably the same, though it is explained the city of King Hasti having been founded by a Prince of that name, the son of Suhotra and father of Ajamidha: the ruins of Hástinapura, long the capital of Gangetic India, are now covered with ant-hills, and only a place of worship remains, about 20 miles S. W. from Dá-ránagar, on a branch of the Ganges, formerly the bed of the river. [Lassen, I, 597. Beilage I, p. XXIII.]

¹ The families of Vrishní and Andhaka were divisions of the line of Yadu, of which Kṛishna was a descendant.

² Arjuna the third of the Pándava³, the youngest son of Pṛithá by Indra. [Lassen, I, 634. 41.]

Wiielded the battleaxe or whirled the mace
 Or rapid with the trenchant falchion smote.
 Nor less in peaceful virtues shone the Prince:
 Submissive ever to his teacher's will Contented, modest, affable and mild—
 Him Droṇa favoured, and prophetic hailed Unequalled archer 'mongst the sons of men.

And now expert in arms the youthful band,
 Their great preceptor thus addressed the king
 Amidst his peers assembled, holy Kṛipa
 And wise Bahlíka, valiant Somadatta,
 Sagacious Bhíshma, the immortal bard
 Vyása and the prudent Vidura¹: Great King,
 Thy princes have acquired due skill in arms;
 Command and let their prowess be approved
 By public trial. Pleased the monarch cried:
 Thy task, illustrious son of Bharadwája,
 Is worthily accomplished; speak the time,
 The place, and all thy judgement shall esteem
 Essential to the honourable proof:

¹ Kṛipa and Bhíshma have been already introduced to our readers. Bahlíka, whence the country of Bálhika or Balkh is supposed to be named [Lassen, I, 597. Weber, Ind. Stud., I, 205.] was the brother of Śántanu, uncle of Bhishma and great uncle of Dhṛitaráshtra, Somadatta is his son. Vyása is the author of the Mahábhárata, the arranger of the Vedas and the supposed author of the Puráṇas, he was the son of the sage Parásara by Satyavati, the adopted daughter of a fisherman, afterwards married to Śántanu, and the appointed father of Dhṛitaráshtra and Páṇdu. Vidura is also the son of Vyása by a female slave, and consequently the half brother of Dhṛitaráshtra. [Lassen, I, 629. 34.]

Do thou command, we shall obey thy will:
And deeper now our grief that light no more
Revisits these sad eyes, and much we envy
Our happier peers who may behold with joy
The martial promise of our princely sons.
Go, Vidura, and what the sage ordains—
Attentively fulfill, no dearer thought
Our bosom cherishes than his content.

Attended by the brother of the king,
The sage went forth and chose the field of arms:
A level plain, where tree and bush was none
To break the smoothness of the turfy ground.
Wide was the champain spread and round the marg
A cool pellucid stream meandering flowed—
Within the circle pious Droṇa reared
An altar for an offering to the Gods.
Next on the borders of the plain arose
A tall pavilion rich with gold and pearl,
And hung with trophies and the spoils of war—
With gorgeous seats provided for the King,
The peers, the Queens and beauty of the palace.
Then soon around, the busy artists reared
Innumerable galleries, and tents and booths,
To shade the throngs that from the city poured
In countless concourse to behold the scene.

Now all the lofty instruments of war
Proclaimed the festival; the King went forth
In long procession, by his peers attended.

Then came the royal matron, great Gándhári'—
The widowed mother of the sons of Páñdu
Walked at her side; a lengthening line of dames,
And maidens eminent in rank as beauty,
Followed their steps, like a bright train they moved
Of heavenly nymphs ascending the steep mount
Of Meru, with the brides of the immortals:
Fast from the city rushed a mingled swarm,
Of every age and tribe, and wide around
A tossing multitude enclosed the field,
Like ocean heaving with unresting waves.

Arrayed in white, and white with hoary age,
 The venerable Droña in the midst
 Of the vast circle stood : his valiant Son
 Upstayed his steps, as moves the stately moon,
 With fiery Mars attendant, through the skies ;
 Attentive to his beck the priestly choir
 Advanced, and on the altar sacrificed
 The offering to the gods, with holy texts
 Made sacred, and from fear of evil guarded :
 The ceremony closed, the heralds cried
 The hour propitious, and the gallant band
 Of youthful rivals marched into the field.

Their loins were girt, their left arms bound with horn²,
 The breast with corselet mailed; the quiver graced

² Or leather, to protect them from the bowstring.

The shoulder; and the better hand sustained
The sturdy bow ; a martial host preceded,
Who various implements of war conveyed :
In decent file according to their years
Arrayed, the Princes graceful trod the field,
And Yudhishthira eldest led the van :
The sports commenced and at the destined aim
The arrows flew, the multitude beheld
With wonder their unerring flight, and many Declined their looks, unable to sustain
The dazzling aspect of the fearful shower ;
Now standing on the ground they drew the bow
And struck the distant mark with glittering shaft,
Nor with less truth the feathered arrows plied,
On generous steeds in rapid circles borne ;
The crowds delighted marked their youthful prowess,
And long continued plaudits shook the field¹.

Next on the thundering car the heroes stood,
And dexterous guided in its swift career.
Then on the giant elephant ascended
Or strode the steed, and in the mimic fight
With sword and shield the shock of war portrayed :
Then mingling in tumultuous mellay waved
The falchion and here singly one sustained
The blows of numbers, or there numbers mixed
Opposed, and all in strength and speed and grace,

¹ Many passages in this and other works prove the Hindus to have cultivated archery most assiduously, and to have been very Parthians in the use of the bow on horseback.

Alacrity of limb, unyielding grasp,
Firmness of foot and steadiness of soul,
Displayed their master's merits and their own.

With more than seeming enmity inspired,
The proud Duryodhana and gallant Bhîma
Apart from all, upon the plain alighting,
Each other to the proof of arms defied:
With ponderous mace they waged the daring fight:
As for a tender mate two rival elephants
Engage with frantic fury, so the youths
Encountered, and amidst the rapid sphere
Of fire their whirling weapons clashing wove:
Their persons vanished from the anxious eye—
Still more and more incensed their combat grew,
And life hung doubtful on the desperate conflict:
With awe the crowd beheld the fierce encounter
And amidst hope and fear suspended tossed
Like ocean shaken by conflicting winds.
Then Droṇa interposed: he bade his son
Intrepid Áswatthámá part the combat,
Swelling like ocean waves when gales uplift
The mighty main: the daring youths obeyed
Their teacher's mandate, and surceased the strife.

Then Droṇa summoned from his princely peers
His favorite pupil: "Dearer than a son,
Come hither, Arjuna," the youth advanced,
Begirt with radiant arms and mailed in gold,
As glorious as a cloud at set of sun
Upon whose edge the parting day yet lingers,

While lightning streams along its glittering sides,
And Indra's bow shoots gorgeous o'er its breast¹:
As modest moved the youthful hero, rose
The clang of shells and trumpets, and loud shouts
Of admiration from the gazing crowd:
They hailed him Arjuna, the first in arms,
And worth; the flower of modesty and valour;
The cries ascended where his mother sat,
And o'er her bosom, swelling with delight,
And pride, fast fell the fond maternal tear.

Commanded by his teacher, Arjun drove²
His chariot bounding o'er the spacious field,
With dexterous rein, and as it rolled he rose,
Erect or cowering shrunk, now in the midst
He stood, then forward on the pole, then leaped
To earth, then vaulted on the whirling car,
And still with shaft undeviating pierced
The subtlest mark, the softest and most flexile
And most refractory, with equal aim:
At once five arrows in the iron jaws
Of a vast boar who formidable scoured
The plain³ he lodged: then twenty shafts he shot

¹ This is the genuine offspring of a tropical climate and no less just than splendid.

² We omit Arjuna's exploits with the mystical weapons of fire, water, &c. as they are implements of which we cannot form, much less convey any exact idea.

³ We believe the author means an iron effigy and therefore plead guilty to a gratuitous innovation: in this and still more in the following feat it will be thought that our author draws a

Together in the hollow of a horn
 Suspended by a lithe loose waving string.
 Applauding shouts repaid the archer's skill,
 And heaven and earth loud echoed with his praise.

And now in troops the youthful bands divided
 Awhile reposed, the five brave brethren here
 With Droṇa in their centre, like the moon
 When through the five-starred house of Hasta¹ moving:

The hundred Sons of Dhṛitaráshtra there
 Round Aśwatthámá gathered like the Gods,
 Around their monarch when the giant race
 Of Daityas threat with impious war the skies.
 When on the sudden from the barrier rose
 A clamour rending heaven: all eyes were turned Towards the place, and from the gate approached
 Through wondering crowds the Sun's bright progeny,
 The valiant Karna²: on his breast he wore reasonably long bow: to shoot a number of arrows at once in a firm compact manner was however no doubt the ambition of Hindu archery in ancient days.

¹ The thirteenth of the lunar mansions or asterisms which mark the moon's path: it contains five stars of which the brightest is supposed to be γ or δ corvi. [Journal of the Amer. Or. Soc. VI, 334.]

² Karna was the son of Pṛithá by the Phœbus of Hindu mythology: as he was born before the lady was married she exposed him in the Jamná, where he was found and preserved by Dhṛitaráshtra's charioteer: the protection of his real father was also extended to him, and consequently in his youth he became a hero of the first order: the circumstances of this encounter, and other oc-

The mail that to his birth was given¹: his ears
 With gorgeous pendants shone: with bow in hand
 And mighty falchion girt, he proud advanced
 And like a moving mountain strode the field.
 The virgin-born, the offspring of the sun,
 The tamer of his foes, the chief of fame,
 Tall as a palm, and as a lion strong.

Erect amidst the plain he paused, and viewed
 With looks of pride the multitude around;
 To Droṇa homage paid, then turned to Arjuna,
 And thus defied the prince, "whate'er thine arm
 This day has wrought I pledge me to surpass,
 The holy sage permitting": at his words,
 As by a vast machine at once upraised
 All rose, and most Duryodhana rejoiced
 To hear his vaunt, for shame and indignation,
 Surprise and envy of his kinsman's glory
 And ancient hatred rankled at his heart.

Then Droṇa gave assent, and every feat
 By Arjuna achieved was wrought by Karṇa.
 Duryodhana his joy proclaimed aloud, he clasped
 The hero to his heart: whate'er the realm Affords, demand, I plight my princely vow,
 'Tis thine my friend: and Karṇa made reply,

casions on which he experienced the disregard of his brethren threw him into the arms of their enemies and he proved one of the chief supports of Duryodhana and the Kurus.

¹ Karṇa like Minerva was born ready equipped for the field;
 armed with a miraculous cuirass and lance.

The name of friend contents my proudest hopes.
Again to Arjuna he turned and said,
Thus far our skill is equal, let it now
Be seen in single fight where vantage lies.
The Prince replied: Quick be it mine to send thee
To learn what regions tenant those who come
Unbidden guests or vaunt uncalled their prowess:
The field of conflict, Karna cried, is free
To all the brave, and to the princely mind
The proof of valour is the proof of virtue:
Why should these idle pastimes swell your pride
To strike with shafts innocuous, toys like these:
Mine seek a nobler mark. My arrows fly
Here in thy teacher's presence at thy head.

Thus vaunting he, and either stood prepared,
To wage no sportive war, when from the seat
Where sat the royal dames a cry of grief
Broke wild upon their purpose. By his arms,
And voice and bold demeanour Pritha knew
Her first-born Son in Karna, and appalled
To see the Brothers, mutually unknown,
On hostile thought intent, she strove to stay
The horrid strife: in vain: oblivion sealed
Her every sense and Vidura conveyed
The dame unconscious to the regal dome.

To grace his martial Son the valiant Arjuna,
The monarch of the elements¹ descended—

¹ Indra the father of Arjuna: all the sons of Pritha were be-

Upon his path the muttering thunder followed;
The brilliant lightning waved; his own bright bow
Its many-coloured banner spread, and high
A pearly line of wild fowl winged the air.
This when the sovereign of the day, the sire
Of gallant Karna, saw, he quick repaired
To grace his darling son with rival glory.
So stood the youths opposed, protecting shade
O'er Arjuna impending hung, his foe
Stood radiant glittering in the solar ray.
Conflicting feelings filled the anxious crowd
And equal shared the interest of the fight.

And now stood either on the verge of fate
When sapient Kṛipa Karna thus addressed:
Undaunted stranger,—this the youngest son
Of Pritha and of Pandu will not shrink
From thine encounter, but do thou declare
Thy name and lineage; of what royal house
Art thou the ornament: this known, the fight
Proceeds, if thou an equal champion prove
With princes to contend: the sons of kings
Strive not with rivals of inferior birth.
He said and ceased, and Karna silent stood
And hung his head, as when surcharged with dew
The drooping Lotus bows its fragrant blossom.

Him thus abashed Duryodhanabeheld gotten by divinities; it being death to her own husband Pandu to approach her.

And instant cried: awhile the sports suspend,
 And then no plea be wanting to the trial;
 The state of Anga¹ of its lord bereft
 Upon our will depends, this valiant chief
 Be crowned its sovereign; then with equal pride
 He calls thee Arjuna to equal arms.
 Away,—this instant sees the hero king.

Impetuous thus the Prince, and none presumed
 To question his resolve; so ceased the sports,
 And Karṇa was installed as Anga's king².

Ib. Vol. IV (Septbr. 1825), p. 141—150.

(THE Swayamvara, the free, or self election of a husband, was a not uncommon practice amongst the Hindus, and forms the subject of frequent description both in ancient and modern poetry: the Princes being assembled in a public place, with appropriate ceremonies, the Princess performed the tour of the circle, and signified her preference by throwing a garland of flowers

¹ Anga lay upon the Ganges including part of Behar and Bhagulpur and Rájmahal.

² In the original some further squabbling takes place after Karṇa's installation before the party breaks up, and Karṇa's adoptive father, Dhṛitaráshṭra's charioteer, makes his appearance, and claims him as his son, to the great triumph of the Pándavas. Duryodhana continues to advocate his cause, but no strife ensues, and embittered hostility is the only result of the sports.

upon the neck of the successful competitor: the marriage rite was subsequently performed as usual. It may be easily supposed that the preference was not always the suggestion of the moment and grew out of previous acquaintance: thus Damayantí adopted this mode of chusing Nala in concert with her lover: Táravatí chose Chandrasekhara by the guidance of her nurse, and the Princess of Canoj invited Prithu Rai to her Swayamvara. The consequences may also be easily conjectured, and mortified vanity or disappointed expectation must often have engendered personal hostility: the result may not unfrequently have been long and widely felt, and though neither the Swayamvaras of Draupadí or Damayantí may have been attended with any remarkable events, the choice of the Princess of Canoj was less innoxious; for the animosity which it excited between her father and her lord, laid India bare to Mohammedan aggression, and paved the way for European ascendancy.)

THE CHOICE OF DRAUPADÍ.

Their wandering steps directed: on the road
They past assembled throngs, travelling alike
A northward journey. From a pious troop
Of Brahmans Yudhishtira asked the cause
Of this advancing host, and whither bound.
They answered:—In Panchála's¹ spacious realm
The powerful monarch Drupada observes
A solemn feast: attending princes wait
With throbbing hearts his beauteous daughter's choice;

The royal Draupadī², whose charms surpass
All praise, as far as her mild excellence
And mind transcend the beauties of her person.
She from the sacrificial hearth was born
When her imperial Sire performed the rite
To win him sons, whose prowess might avenge
The wrongs he had sustained from Droṇa's pride.
Then too her gallant brother Dhṛiṣṭadyumna,
Arrayed in shining mail, and armed with bow
And falchion, like the flashing gleam of flame³

¹ Panchála. In addition to the observations on this country made on a former occasion (see above), we may add that we have since met with a tract in which Nepal is said to be comprised within Northern Panchála.

³ The birth of Draupadi and Dhṛiṣṭadyumna is thus related in the Mahābhārata [I, ch. 167]. Although Drupada was compelled to acquiesce in the arrangement made by Droṇa, by which his rule was confined to the country south of the Bhāgirathi, the partition

Sprang radiant from the consecrated fire.
Now ripe the nymph in years and charms, the king
Commands her wed some prince of her election.

was the cause of deep mortification, and he long meditated on the means by which he might recover his former power and be revenged upon his enemy. He especially regretted the want of a son whose youth and valour might compete with Droṇa's disciples, and he visited the chief resorts of the Brahmans, in hope to meet with some holy sage, whose more than human faculties might secure him progeny. He found two Brahmans of eminent learning and sanctity named Yāja and Upayāja, and addressed himself to the latter, promising him a million of cows if he enabled him to obtain the son he desired. Upayāja, however, declined the task and referred him to his elder brother Yāja, to whom the King repaired and promised ten million of kine: with much reluctance he undertook to direct a sacrificial ceremony by which the King should obtain offspring, and called his younger brother to his assistance. When the rite had reached the proper period the queen was invited to partake of it, but she had not completed her toilet and begged the Brahmans to delay the ceremony. It was too late, and the sacrifice proceeding without her, the children were born independent of her participation. The son Dhṛiṣṭadyumna appeared with a diadem on his head, in full mail and armed with a bow and falchion from the middle of the sacrificial fire. Draupadī the daughter from the middle of the vedi, or altar, on which the fire had been kindled! she was of very black colour although exceeding loveliness, and was thence named Kṛishná; the name of the son is derived from the pride and power with which he was endowed from his birth.

Thither we go and willingly shall guide
 Your steps to share with us the liberal gifts
 That princely bounty on our tribe bestows;
 Or to behold, if so your youth prefer,
 The joyous revelry that gilds the scene;
 For thither mummers, mimes and gleemen throng,
 Athletics, who the prize of strength or skill
 Contend in wrestling or the gauntlet's strife:
 Minstrels with sounding lutes and Bards¹ who chant
 Their lord's high lineage and heroic deeds—
 These merry sports beheld, you may return
 With us or where you list, unless it chance
 The Princess toss the wreath to one of you—
 For you are goodly and of God-like bearing.
 Thus he, and blithe Yudhishthira replied—
 Have with you to the wedding. So they went To South Panchála with the Brahman band.

¹ The persons named in the text are Naṭas, Vaitálíkas, Nartakas, Sutas, Mágadhas, and Niyodhakas. The Naṭa is properly an actor, but in popular acceptance it comprehends jugglers, buffoons, and persons practising slight of hand and exhibiting feats of agility; in this last also the Nartaka partakes, although properly speaking a dancer. The Vaitálíka in his official character is a poetical watchman or a bellman—one who announces in verse the change of the seasons and the hours of the day—when not retained for the purpose he is a public singer. The Sutas and Mágadhas are both considered to discharge the same kind of duty, and are the bards and heralds of the Hindus, being attached to the state of all men of rank to chaunt their praises, celebrate their actions, and commemorate their ancestry. The Niyodhaka is a prize-fighter either as a wrestler or boxer or a swordsman—in some parts of India also he fights with gauntlets, armed with steel spikes.

Through many a smiling grove their journey lay
 And by the marge of many a limpid lake.
 And oft they loitering paused upon their route
 To mark the beauties of each grateful scene.
 At length arrived, they made their humble dwelling
 A Potter's lowly roof—and daily forth
 They fared as mendicants to gather alms.
 And now the day of festival drew nigh;
 When Drupada, whose anxious hopes desired
 A son of Pandu for his daughter's lord,
 And who had sent his messengers to search
 The banished chiefs, still sought by them in vain
 Devised a test—no other force but theirs
 He deemed could undergo, to win the bride.
 A ponderous bow with magic skill he framed¹;
 Unyielding but to more than mortal strength.
 And for a mark he hung a metal plate
 Suspended on its axle, swift revolving
 Struck by a shaft that from the centre strayed.
 This done he bade proclaim—that he whose hand
 Should wing the arrow to its destined aim,
 Should win the Princess by his archery.

¹ Trial of strength by the drawing of a bow is a favourite subject in Hindu poetry, and the heroes of two of the most celebrated and most ancient works in Sanskrit, the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyaṇa, both win their wives in a similar manner. Arjuna gains Draupadī as in the text, and Rāma obtains Sītā by breaking the bow of Śiva, which other princes were unable to bend. We need not remind our readers of the bow of Ulysses here—we lately pointed out one coincidence between Hindu and Homeric fiction (above. p. 259) and this seems to furnish a second.

Before the day appointed, irooping came
 Princes and chiefs innumeros: 'midst the throng
 Duryodhana and all the hundred sons
 Of Dhritarashtra with the gallant Karna
 In haughty cohort at the court appeared.
 With hospitable act the king received
 His royal guests and fitting welcome gave.

Between the North and East without the gates
 There lay a spacious plain: a fosse profound
 And lofty walls enclosed its ample circuit,
 And towering gates and trophied arches rose,
 And tall pavilions glittered round its borders:
 Here ere the day of trial came, the sports
 Were held: and loud as ocean's boisterous waves,
 And thick as stars that gem the Dolphin's brow',
 The mighty city here her myriads poured.
 Around the monarch's throne on lofty seats
 Of gold with gems emblazoned sat the kings,
 Each lowering stern defiance on the rest.
 Without the barriers pressed the countless crowd

¹ In the head of the Śiśumāra.—The Śiśumāra is properly the Gangetic porpoise (Delphinus gangeticus), but the astronomical Śiśumāra [Vishnu Pur. II, 12. Bhāgav. Pur. V, 23.] to which the allusion is made is as much a non-descript as any of the pictured monstrosities on our celestial globe—(see Sir Wm. Jones' supplement to the Essay on Hindu chronology A. Res. II, 402). The commentator says the expression is a parenthetical equivalent for the North-east quarter, that being the situation of the asterism—and implies, that the people assembled in that direction. He is probably right; but we prefer being wrong.

Appropriate, and with pious blessings crowned.
 Then bade the king the trumpets' clangor cease
 And hush the buzzing crowd—while his brave son
 The gallant Dhṛishtadyumna on the plain Descended and his father's will proclaimed.
 "Princes, this bow behold—yon mark—these shafts—
 Whoe'er with dexterous hand at once directs
 Five arrows to their aim, and be his race,
 His person and his deeds equivalent
 To such exalted union, He obtains
 My sister for his bride—my words are truth."
 Thus said, he to the Princess next described
 Each royal suitor by his name and lineage¹

¹ The author favours us with their names—and as a catalogue of the chief dramatis personæ of the Mahábhárata it may be admissible in a note, although a hopeless recapitulation for the text. The principal sons of Dhṛitaráshtra are Duryodhana, Durvishaha—Durmukha—Dushpradarshaṇa, Vivinsati, Vikarna, Duhśāsana, Yuyutsu, Váyuvega—Bhímavegarava, Ugráyudha, Valáki, Karakáyu, Virochana, Kuṇḍaka, Chitrasena, Kanakadhwaaja, Nandaka, Báhnśáli, Tuhúnda, and Vikata—the other princes are Karṇa, the half brother of the Pándus; Aśwatthamá, the son of Droṇa; Bhoja, whose name is traceable in many parts of India and at different periods; Vrihanta, Maṇimán, Daṇḍadhára, Sahadeva, Jayasena—Meśhasandhi, Viráta, his two sons Śankha and Uttara, Varddhakshemi, Suśarmá, Senávinḍu, Suketu, and his son Suvarchas, Su-chitra, Sukumára; Vrika, Satyadhṛiti, Súryadhwaaja, Rochamána, Nila, Chitráyudha, Ansumán, Chekitána, Śreṇimán, Chandrasena, the son of Samudrasena, Jalasandha, and his sons Daṇḍa and Vi-daṇḍa, Vásudeva, king of Pauṇḍra, Bhagadatta, Kalinga and Tá m-ralípta or the kings of those countries.—The king of Madra, Śalya with his sons Rukmangada and Rukmaratha.—Kauravya, Somadatta, Bhúri, Bhúriśrava, Śala, Sudakshina, the king of Kamboja,

And martial deeds, and bade her give the wreath
 To him whose prowess best deserved the boon.
 Quick from their gorgeous thrones the kings uprose,
 Descending to the conflict, and around
 The lovely Draupadī contending pressed;
 Like the bright gods round Śiva's mountain bride¹.
 Love lodged his viewless arrows in their hearts,
 And jealous hatred swelled their haughty minds;
 Each on his rivals bent a lowering glance,
 And friends till now, they met as deadliest foes.
 Alone the kindred bands remained aloof
 Who owned² Janardana their glorious chief.
 He and the mighty³ Haláyudha curbed
 Their emulous zeal,—and tranquil they beheld
 Like furious elephants the monarchs meet;

Dhṛtadhānwa, Paurava, Vṛihadbala, Sushena, Śivi, Ausinara—
 The destroyer of Pañchajanya—The sovereign of the Kārushas.
 The chiefs of the house of Yadu are Balarāma, Kṛishṇa, the son or less prominent in the subsequent conflict.

Their rage by courteous seeming ill repress
Like fire amidst the smouldering embers glowing

And now in turn the Princes to the trial
Succeeding past, in turn to be disgraced—
No hand the stubborn bow could bend—they strained
Fruitless each nerve, and many on the field
Recumbent fell, whilst laughter pealed around.
In vain they cast aside their royal robes
And diamond chains and glittering diadems,
And with unfettered arm and ample chest
Put forth their fullest strength—the bow defied
Each chief nor left the hope he might succeed.
Karna alone the yielding bowstring drew
And ponderous shafts applied, and all admired.
The timid Draupadi in terror cried,
I wed not with the base-born¹—Karna smiled

¹ As previously intimated, the birth of Karna was secret, and he was reputed to be the son of Nandana the charioteer of Dhritarashtra, having been found floating in the river Yamuna although the son of Pritha, the mother of the three elder Pandava princes by the Sun—he was born in celestial panoply, and with splendid ear-rings, whence his first appellation was Vasushena, or abounding in wealth. Indra disguised as a Brahman begged of him his divine coat of mail, in order to obtain it for his own son Arjuna, and from the act of cutting or detaching it from his body the prince was named Karna; he is also entitled Vaikartana from Vikartana, the sun. Indra, in return for the armour, presented Karna with a Javelin freighted with the certain death of one individual whether god, man, or demon. Karna launched it at Ghatotkacha, the Rakshasa son of Bhima, and it destroyed him, but left its possessor helpless against the charmed weapons offensive and defensive of Arjuna, by whose hand Karna ultimately fell.

In bitterness and upwards turned his eyes
 To his great Sire the Sun—then cast to earth
 The bow and shafts and sternly stalked away.—

Thus foiled the Princes, through the murmuring crowd

Amazement spread—then Arjuna from where
 He and his brethren with the Brahmans placed
 Had viewed the scene advanced to prove his skill—
 The priestly bands with wonder struck beheld
 Who seemed a student of their tribe aspire
 To triumph where the mightiest chiefs had failed—
 They deemed the like disgrace would shame the attempt,

And ridicule their race and name assail,
 And many a venerable elder strove
 To turn the stripling from the hopeless task:
 They strove in vain—nor did they all despair—
 For many marked his elephantine strength,
 His lion port and self-collected soul;
 And fancied that they saw revived in him
 The son of Jamadagni¹: to o'erthrow
 Oncemore the haughty Kshatriya's² power and pride.

Paraśurāma, by whom the Kshatriya or military race was exterminated. [Mahābh. III, c. 117.]

¹ Walking round a temple, an image, a venerable personage, or any object of veneration is an act of worship, amongst the Hindus. The rite was not unknown as a purificatory one to the ancients; as Virgil: Idem ter socios pura circumtulit unda. The circumambulation of holy shrines is also an act of frequent practice in Roman Catholic countries.

Unheeding praise or censure, Arjuna
Passed to the field: with reverential steps
He round the weapon circled, next addressed
A silent prayer to Mahádeo and last
With faith inflexible on Krishńa dwelt.
One hand the bow upbore, the other drew
The sturdy cord, and placed the pointed shafts—
They flew—the mark was hit—and sudden shouts
Burst from the crowd long silent: fluttering waved
The Brahman scarfs, and drum and trumpet brayed,
And Bard and Herald sung the hero's triumph.

Well pleased the monarch marked the youthful might

That had succeeded where so many chiefs
Of high renown were foiled, and deemed secure
His state by such alliance—nor was Draupadī
The less content, her beauties were the prize
Of youth and grace as well as skill in arms.
But in the bosoms of the Princes burned
Indignant wrath, and each to other spake
Congenial rage. Behold, they cried, the king
Regards us light as straws, and deigns to wed
His daughter to this Brahman boy whose craft
Has humbled royalty: but shall this be?
Destroy the parent tree, and with it falls
The fruit distasteful: haughty and unjust
This heedless monarch from our rank withholds
The reverence due to kings. Then let him die—
Him and his son together. He invites us

Here to his palace, and with outward seeming
 Of hospitable rite receives us, soon
 In scorn to end: what makes a Brahman here
 In scenes like these? The Vedas have ordained,
 A royal maid's election of her lord
 Alone is fitting to the martial race.
 Though Brahman arrogance or avarice urge
 This trespass on our birthright, yet on them
 We may not as we should avenge our wrongs;
 The Brahman's life is sacred: then descend
 Our fury on the guilty race of Drupada.
 He and his son shall feel our swords: the maid,
 Unless she chuse a royal lord, be tossed
 Into the flame: then part we to our homes.

Thus they, and soon their gleaming weapons menaced

The life of Drupada: the king in terror
 Turned to the Brahmans: Arjuna at once
 Rushed to his succour and defied his foes.
 Quick to his side came Bhíma¹: like the judge

¹ Bhíma [Mahábh. I, c. 123.] is the Hercules or Orlando of the mythological poetry of the Hindus; his uncommon strength was a supernatural endowment. In his youth, he was the great plague of the Kuru princes, beating them in every sport and contest. They therefore plotted to get rid of him, and at a juvenile party, at one of the water palaces of the king, administered a poisonous drug to him, and took advantage of his slumber to push him into the Ganges. He fell into the region of the subterrene snakes, by whom he was bitten; one poison was the antidote of the other, and Bhíma recovering from his sleep, soon beat off his antagonists: they fled

Of hell with ponderous mace, for as he passed
 A stately tree he by the roots uptore
 And wielded for the fight: nor long delayed
 The great Yudhishtíra, nor the brave twins,
 And all in firm fraternal phalanx stood.
 The Brahmans round the princely cohort gathered,
 In vain by Arjuna advised to shun
 A strife ill suited to their gentler studies.—
 Awhile the kings their course restrained, admiring

to their king Vásuki, who was induced by their report to see the wonderful boy, and went to meet him. In his train was Aryaka the maternal great great grandfather of Bhíma, who recognised and welcomed his descendant. Aryaka being a great favourite with the King of the Nágas, Vásuki offered to give his relation any treasure or gems he could desire, but Aryaka asked permission for him to quaff the invigorating beverage, of which one bowl full contained the strength of a thousand Nágas: permission being granted, Bhíma drained this bowl eight times at as many draughts and then went quietly to sleep for eight days. on his waking he was feasted by the Nágas and then restored to his sorrowing mother and brethren. From this period dates his miraculous strength.—Many of these incidents find parallels in western Romance. The Lady of the lake inhabits the depths of the water and is called by Merlin the “white serpent”; the Fata Morgana resided beneath a lake while caressing one of her lovers as a serpent. She is also styled the Fairy of Riches: her treasures were spread over a plain to which Orlando arrived by falling in a conflict with Arridano to the bottom of an enchanted lake: Manto, the protecting fairy of Mantua, [Orl. Fur. 43, 74.] being saved by Adonio when pursued in the form of a snake, proffers him any thing he may desire. The account she gives of herself makes her to be a regular Nága Kanyá or Ophite Maiden. The feat of Bhíma may be paralleled by a similar one of Orlando, and many others of the preux chevaliers of Chivalry.

The novel daring of the priestly tribe,
Then more indignant hastened to chastise them.
By Karna and by Salva led, opposed
To Arjuna and Bhima as to those Who best deserved their force, like Elephants
With passion maddening, headlong on they rushed :
Like Elephants the brothers met their might.
Against the Brahman band Duryodhana
The royal squadron led, both with disdain
For foes unwarlike filled, they curbed their prowess—

And waged contemptuously sportive strife.
When Karna felt the vigour of that arm
Unequaled, he, astounded, paused and spake.
Brahman, thy prowess should not want my praise,
But that it wakes my wonder: what? art thou
Some deity disguised in mortal form?
No Brahman could display such martial skill,
Nor breathes the man who could defy my strength,
Save Arjuna. To Karna then the Prince:
No God am I—nor hero—to the use
Of arms my holy teachers trained my youth.
And here I stand to tame thy haughty pride
And triumph o'er thy fame: then, chief, be firm!
But Karna from the field withdrew: for vain
He deemed it to contend with Brahman might.

Elsewhere the furious king of Madra fought
With powerful Bhima: both alike in arms
Expert, and with gigantic force endued.

Long they contended, nor could either boast
 Of vantage gained: their shattered arms they threw
 Aside, and grappling to each other clung:
 With hand and knee and chest to chest opposed,
 They struggled long; at length the sudden grasp
 Of Bhíma from the ground the king upbore
 And dashed him with resistless sweep to earth.
 Stunned by the fall the haughty monarch lay Senseless and bleeding at his victor's feet.

Appalled by Śalya's fate and Karna's flight,
 The princes changed their anger for surprise,
 And humbled to the seeming Brahmans spake.
 'Tis bravely done, and we confess your prowess.
 But what your birth, or where your country, tell,
 Whose is the valour that has equal stood
 The son of Rádhá¹: whose the strength that felled
 The king of Madra? they are champions both
 That few of their compeers would dare encounter.
 Suspend the strife: although we stand as foes,
 We own due reverence for your sacred race.
 Comply with our request: then if ye list
 The conflict be resumed. Thus humbly they.
 The sons of Páñdu stern surveyed the kings
 Nor deigned reply: but Vāsudeva's² glance
 Had penetrated their disguise, not yet
 To be unveiled to hostile eyes: and soothed

The wounded indignation of the Princes.
 His gentle intercession lulled their rage,
 And sullen from the field the Kings retired,
 Midst shouts of triumph from the Brahman train.
 Then round the hero's neck the trembling hand
 Of Draupadī the marriage chaplet flung,
 And with his lovely bride, the prize of valour¹,

¹ Although won by Arjuna, Draupadī became, as is well known, the wife of all the brothers—or as Sir Win. Jones calls her—“a five male single female flower.” This plurality of husbands is unauthorized by any provision in the Hindu law, although prevalent throughout the Himálaya mountains, and in Malabar. The author of the Mahábhárata, in preserving a circumstance, that must have been repulsive to his own feelings, must have been influenced by the general belief in a tradition, which he could not have invented. Its insertion is a proof, that he drew the materials of his poem from other sources than his own imagination—he is clearly very much embarrassed with it, and endeavours to make sundry apologies for it. On the brothers returning to their college with Draupadī, they tell their mothers they have brought alms (Bhikshá) to which she replies without looking at them—being engaged in household matters—“Share it among ye all.” When she finds the article to be so divided is a daughter-in-law, she is much shocked, but her words cannot be recalled, and Draupadī consequently becomes the bride of all her sons. As if conscious, however, that this excuse is not quite sufficient, the author of the Mahábhárata puts strong objections to it in the mouth of Drupada, who states that he had heard of one husband having many wives, but never of one wife's having many husbands, and declares it to be forbidden by usage, and the Vedas. [M. Müller, History of ancient Sanskrit Literature, p. 44 ff.] Yudhishthira replies that the practice may plead precedent, and instances the case of the ten sages called Práchetasas who had one wife, Gautamī, in common. Drupada, however, continuing to refuse his assent, Vyása is obliged to appear, the dilemma requiring such an arbitrator; and he overrules the objections of the king by relating to him a legend, by which it appears, that the five Pándus are five forms of Indras four of whom were exhibited to the fifth by Mahádeva, to humble the pride of the king of Swarga, and all five are with the same view condemned to a mortal birth, their Śrí also, or the personified glory of their royal condition, is sentenced to be born as their wife. She is Draupadi. At the same time Vishnú, on being made acquainted with the story by Indra, takes two hairs, a white and a black one, and these become the children of Devaki, Balaráma and Kṛishná. The worshippers of the latter who maintain, that he is Vishnu's whole self, are not well pleased with this account of his origin.

INTRODUCTION TO THE DAŚA KUMĀRA CHARITĀ.

Oriental Text Society. London: MDCCCXLVI.

THE Daśa Kumāra Charitā, or “Adventures of the Ten Princes”, has been selected for publication on account of its manifold claims on the attention of the cultivators of Sanskrit literature.

It is scarcely necessary to remind Sanskrit students, that the works hitherto published, conformably to the general character of Sanskrit composition, have been almost exclusively written in metre; and that the only specimens of prose which have been placed within their reach are the narratives of the Hitopadeśa, the occasional dialogue of the dramas, technical works on law or grammar, or Scholia on metrical texts. A continuous and standard prose composition is still wanting in printed Sanskrit literature, and the want is now supplied by a work written in a highly cultivated style, but entirely in prose; a work of deservedly high reputation among the learned of India, and one presenting various objects of interest to the scholars of Europe.

The style of the Daśa Kumára Charita is of that elaborate description which has induced native scholars to ascribe to the work the denomination of a Kávyā, or Poem. It is not uniformly, however, of a poetical elevation; and although passages occur in which, from the use of compound words of more than ordinary length, from a complicated grammatical structure, and from a protracted suspension of the governing term, it may be somewhat difficult to discover the precise meaning; yet, in general, the language is intelligible as well as elegant, and can occasion no great embarrassment to a practised scholar, while it affords him a useful example of classical prose composition.

While the language of the Daśa Kumára Charita is recommended by its general character, it furnishes also, in some of its peculiarities, an advantageous opportunity for the study of a portion of Sanskrit Grammar, of which examples are not often multiplied, particularly in metrical works. Although not written, like the Bhaṭṭī Kávyā, purposely to illustrate grammatical forms, yet the writer particularly affects the use of derivative verbs, and presents a greater number of causal and desiderative inflexions than can be found in any other composition. Whether he, at the same time, purposely omitted the different tenses and persons of the intensive or frequentative verb, tradition has not recorded; but is it very remarkable that, amidst the copiousness of the forms specified, the inflexions of the frequentative verb do not appear. Such fancies as the exclusion of certain words or grammatical forms are not unknown in Sanskrit literature, especially at the period at which this work was probably written; a period at which, although not yet wholly corrupted, an elaborate and artificial style of writing had begun to supplant the simple and more elegant models that had been furnished by the writers of the school of Kálidása.

Tradition affirms the contemporary existence of Daṇḍī, the author of the Daśa Kumāra Charita, and Bhoja Deva, Rájá of Dhárá, the celebrated patron of men of letters at the end of the tenth century*. The internal evidence of the work is not at variance with the traditional date, for it describes both the political and social condition of India at a period anterior to the Mohammedan conquest, and no mention is made of the Mohammedans, except as merchants or as navigators, or rather, perhaps, pirates, in which capacities the Arabs are likely to have been known to the Hindus before the establishment of the slaves of Mohammed Sám at Delhi, and the desolation of Ujjayinī, in the immediate vicinity of Dhárá, by the second of the dynasty, Altmash. In truth, the perfect preservation of the political divisions of Central India, and the consistent delineation of manners unmixedly Hindu, might warrant the attribution of a still earlier date, but that this is opposed by tradition. The style would not be incompatible with an earlier æra, as it is not more elaborate than that of Bhavabhúti, who wrote in the eighth century, although it bears, perhaps, a closer affinity to that of parts of the Mahánátaka, a drama ascribed to Bhoja himself*.

In contradiction, however, to the date usually assigned to the work, or to any earlier æra, we have one internal proof that it is later even than the reign of Bhoja, for the last of the stories relates to a prince who is said to be a member of his race—the Bhoja vanśa—implying, necessarily, the prior existence of that prince. This would be fatal to the evidence of the tradition, as well as of the general tenor of the composition, if there were not a possibility that the story in which the Bhoja vanśa is alluded to is not a part of the original work. It is universally admitted that the Daśa Kumára Charita was left unfinished by the author, and no specification is to be found of the point at which it terminated. The story in question ends abruptly, and would so far confirm the general admission, being in that case Dańdí's own composition: but the style undergoes a change, and the language is less elevated, and the incidents are more diffusely narrated. These considerations suggest some doubt of the genuineness of this portion of the work, although they are not sufficient to justify a conclusive opinion. If the work be, as it stands, the composition of Daṇḍī, he must have flourished some time after Bhoja—not long, however—and in the time of some of his immediate descendants, as the mention of the Bhoja vanśa is clearly intended to be complimentary. This would not be incongruous with the priority of the author to the Mohammedan conquest; and we shall perhaps be not far wide of the truth in placing his composition late in the eleventh or early in the twelfth century.

A work on Alankāra, or Rhetoric, the Kāvyaḍarśa, is also attributed to Daṇḍī. It is not often met with, but there is a copy in the Bodleian Library. It is not of great extent, but the rules are illustrated by examples, taken, it is affirmed, from different authors: unluckily the authors are not named, and it would be a work of time and labour to identify the passages cited: apparently there are some from the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa, and from the writings of Kālidāsa, but there is nothing sufficiently ascertained to warrant any inference of the date of the composition.

The date of the Daśa Kumāra Charita is not the only circumstance connected with it of a questionable character. The very name of the author suggests an uncertainty. Daṇḍī properly designates a “staff bearer”, but is commonly applied to a sect of religious mendicants, who profess to be the spiritual descendants of Śankara Áchárya, a reformer of the eighth century, and who are so termed because they carry a slender dańḍa, or wand. Many of the order have been literary characters; and it is not impossible that one of them may have amused his leisure with inventing the stories in question, however inconsistent with his religious meditations. The work would thus be that of a dańḍí, not of Dańḍí; but it is not generally so considered, Dańḍí being ordinarily regarded, in this instance at least, as a proper name, and associated with the usual honorary prefix, or Śrí Dańḍí*.

The Daśa Kumára Charita, as universally recognised, not only ends abruptly, but begins in an equally abrupt manner, introducing the reader at once to persons and events with whom he has no previous acquaintance. This defect is supplied by an Introductory Section, the Púrva Píthiká, or Preliminary Chapter. This Introduction is commonly ascribed to Dańḍí himself; but as it is somewhat less ambitiously written, and as the incidents related are, in one or two cases, briefly repeated in the body of the work, and with some contradictions, doubts have been started as to the accuracy of the attribution. If not the composition of the same hand, it must be one of nearly the same time and the same school, and may be regarded as the work of one of the author's disciples. Its general congruity, however, with the acknowledged composition of Dańḍí renders it not improbably his work.

The same is not pretended of the Śeśha, or Supplement to the Charita, a continuation and conclusion of the stories. This is the avowed composition of Chakrapāṇi Dīkshita, a Mahratta Brahman, and is written in a style which aspires to surpass that of the original. While, however, more laboriously constructed, and, in consequence, more difficult of interpretation, it falls very far short of its model in purity and vigour; and, as the narrative is puerile and meagre, it offers nothing to repay the trouble of its perusal. It is of considerable length, and on that account, as well as of its want of interest, it has not been thought desirable to perpetuate it by the press.

The introductory portion of the Daśa Kumāra Charita has been twice remodelled and arranged, in an abbreviated form and in verse. One of these versions was made by a celebrated Dakhiṇī writer, Appa or Apyaya Dīkshita, the author of a standard work on rhetoric, the Kuvalayananda. He was patronised by Kṛishṇa Rāya, Rājā of Vijayanāgara, in the beginning of the sixteenth century*. This abridgment was printed at Serampore in 1804, along with the Hitopadeśa and the Śatakas of Bhartṛi Hari. A similar metrical abridgment of the introduction bears the name of Vināyaka, but nothing more is known of the author. Both these abridgments are exceedingly inferior to the original in style and in interest. Neither contains more than two hundred ślokas, and they are both too much compressed to allow of any detailed description of the incidents narrated in the original: the narration is consequently scanty and dull, and not seldom obscure.

A writer who calls himself Mahárájádhirája Gopínátha has undertaken the bolder task of correcting or ameliorating (Saṁsodhanam) the text. Like the two preceding, his introduction is in metre, and in three sections, but they contain six hundred and seventy-nine ślokaś, and are therefore much more diffuse. In the body of the work the author reverts to prose, where his so-called improvement—really a disfigurement—consists in the occasional amplification or explanation of the incidents of the original, the text of which, with such occasional interpolations or substitutions, is given without any alteration. The story is also carried on to completion.

There is also a Commentary on the text of the Daśa Kumára by Śiva Ráma Tiwári*, a Brahman of Benares. It is not without utility, as explaining a few unusual terms, but it is less comprehensive than could be desired.

The subjects of the stories of the Daśa Kumára are those taken from domestic life, and are interesting as pictures of Hindu society for centuries probably anterior to the Mohammedan conquest. The portrait is not flattering: profligacy and superstition seem to be the characteristic features;—not, in general, the profligacy that invades private happiness, nor the superstition that bows down before imaginary divinities, but loose principles and lax morals, and implicit faith in the power of occult rites and magical incantations. The picture does not want some redeeming traits, and the heroes are described as endowed with enterprise and hardihood, with inviolable devotedness to their friends and kindred, and with tender and constant attachment to the objects of their affection. The opportunities which are afforded to the youth of both sexes of forming connexions are of remarkable facility; and the absence of any intimation that the bonds which are so easily contracted are to be considered of brief duration, gives a character of respectability to the very informal unions which take place. The parties however, it must be remembered, are of those classes—the regal and military—among whom marriage by mutual consent, the Gándharba viváha, is a recognised legal compact.

The work presents a great number of names of cities and principalities, of which few vestiges remain. They are to be found, however, in the Puráñas, in the travels of the Chinese in the fourth and sixth centuries, and in the records of the Rajput states; and no doubt define the political divisions of the country which subsisted from a remote period until the subversion of the whole by the tide of Mohammedan invasion. In this respect the work may be considered of historical value, as adding contemporary testimony to the correctness of the political position of a considerable part of India, as derived from other sources of information. A brief sketch of the substance of the stories will best illustrate the light which they are calculated to reflect upon the social and political condition of India during probably the first ten centuries of our æra.

The introduction to the Daśa Kumára brings us acquainted with Rájahansa, king of Magadha, or South Behar, the capital of which is Pushpapura, another name for Pátaliputra, the ancient Palibothra and modern Patna, the identity of which, generally admitted, has been recently confirmed by the discovery of the course of the old bed of the Śoṇe river, which united with the Ganges in the immediate vicinity of the city, conformably to the statement of Arrian, that Palibothra was situated near the confluence of the Erranoboas (the Hirañyabáhu, a synonym of the Śoṇe) and the Ganges. For this conclusive evidence we are indebted to Mr. Ravenshaw, of the Bengal Civil Service (Memorandum on the ancient bed of the Śoṇe, J. As. Soc. B. No. 158). The term Pushpa-putra, the Flower-city, is synonymous with Kusumapura, and is essentially the same with what should probably be the correct reading, Pátali-pura, the Trumpet-flower city. A legend as old as the eleventh century, being narrated in the Kathá-sarit Ságara, published and translated by Mr. Brockhaus, has been invented, to account for the name Pátali-putra; but this has evidently been suggested by the corruption of the name, and does not account for it. That Patna was called Kusumapura, the Flower-city, at a late period, we know from the Chinese-Buddhist travellers, through whom the name Ku-su-mo-pu-lo became familiar to their countrymen*.

Rájahansa, having engaged in warfare with Mánasára, the Rájá of Málava (Malwa), was, in the first instance, victorious, but was finally defeated, and obliged to take shelter in the Vindhya forests, where his wife gave birth to a son, Rájaváhana. The Rájá had three hereditary ministers (Kulámátyas)—a peculiarity in the tenure of office under Government, of which the modern history of Hindu princes affords examples—named Dharmapála, Padmodbhava, and Sitavarmá. Of these, the first had three sons, Sumantra, Sumitra, and Kámapála; Padmodbhava, the second, had two, Suśruta and Ratnodbhava; and the third, Sitavarmá, two, Sumati and Śatyavarmá. Of these, Kámapála, whose habits were dissolute, Ratnodbhava, who was curious of foreign travel, and Satyavarmá, who was of an ascetic temperament, withdrew from court, and wandered about the world; the other four remained with the king, and, upon the death of their fathers, succeeded to their stations. They partook of their master's fortune, and attended him in his retreat; and when the prince Rájaváhana was born, they also had each a son: Sumantra had Mitragupta; Sumitra, Mantragupta; Suśruta had Viśruta; and Sumati, Pramati. During Rájahansa's forest abode, also, there were brought to him or to his queen, on different occasions, five other youths, making, with the sons of the four ministers and Rájaváhana, the Ten Kumáras. Three of these were Arthapála, Pushpodbhava, and Somadatta, the sons, respectively, of the absent ministers, Kámapála, Ratnodbhava, and Satyavarmá, and the other two were Apaháravarmá and Upaháravarmá; who were the sons of Praháravarmá, the king of Mithilá or North Behar, and friend of Rájahansa. Coming to the succour of his friend, he had been involved in his misfortune, and, attempting to regain his country with the reliques of his force, he had been attacked by the foresters, the Savaras, and lost his baggage and attendants. His two children also fell into the hands of the barbarous tribes, and one of them was about to be offered as a victim to Chañdí, when he was saved by the timely interposition of a Brahman. The sacrifice of human victims by the tribes inhabiting the hills and forests of South Behar is often alluded to in the fictions of this date; and the practice, we know, still prevails among some of them, although it seems to have been driven farther to the South, being most prevalent among the Khoñds of Gumsir. It is not long since, however, that proofs of its existence on the frontiers of the Jángal Mahals were brought to the knowledge of the British functionaries.

The nine boys thus assembled were educated along with the prince, and became his constant associates. The particulars of their education present a curious detail of what were considered, no doubt, essentially princely acquirements. The use of various tongues, skill in arms, and the menagement of horses and elephants, acquaintance with tradition, with the rules of polity, with rhetoric and logic, and with music, are qualifications sufficiently appropriate; but we should scarcely have expected to find the list extended to metaphysics, law, and the Vedas, and still less to astrology, medicine, magic, to proficiency in games of skill or chance, and dexterity in thieving; yet such is the author's beau ideal of princely training, and his narratives exhibit the practical application of those accomplishments. It is worthy of observation, as part of the internal evidence of the date of the work, that, besides the specification of the Vedas, Itihása, and Puráñas, the writings of Kauṭilya, more commonly called Cháñakya, and the Kámandaki, are specified as the authorities for the science of Níti, or polity.

As soon as Rájaváhana and his associates had attained a sufficient age, Rájahansa, in obedience to the injunctions of a pious Brahman, allowed them to set off to see the world. They departed together; but, in the course of a few days, Rájaváhana was induced by a stranger Brahman to leave his companions privately, and assist him in obtaining the sovereignty of the subterranean regions, or Pátála. The enterprise succeeds; but when the prince returns to the spot where he had left his friends, they are all gone. Alarmed by his disappearance, the youths had taken different directions in quest of the missing prince, and hence they severally met with separate adventures, the relation of which, when they at last find Rájaváhana, constitutes the matter of the Daśa Kumára Charita.

The first whom prince Rájaváhana, roaming in search of his friends, encounters, is Somadatta. This youth has been instrumental in releasing the daughter of the Rájá of Ujjayiní from the hands of the Rájá of Láta, to whom she had been reluctantly conceded as a bride by her father; and has defeated the forces of Láta, and killed the king in single combat; in requital of which exploits the Rájá of Ujjayiní gives his daughter to Somadatta, and adopts him as Yuvarája, his colleague and successor. He is on his way with his bride to the temple of Mahákála, when he falls in with his prince. Mahákála was one of the twelve Śiva Lingas, which were in high repute about the time of the Mohammedan invasion. The country of Láta was better known, apparently, to ancient than to modern geography, being the Lár or Larike of Ptolemy, and applied to the country south of the Nerbudda, and also the Taptí, corresponding with Nimaur and Khándesh*.

While yet in company with Somadatta, Rájaváhana is joined by another of his companions, Pushpodbhava. This adventurer, in the course of his peregrinations, was surprised by the fall of a man from a precipice upon his head, who proved to be his father, the merchant Ratnodbhava, the son of the minister, the elder Pushpodbhava, who had been wrecked on his voyage from the island of Kálayavana sixteen years before; and having, on that occasion, lost his wife, had been miserable ever since; until at last, unable to support his affliction longer, he casts himself from a rock, and is picked up by his son. Presently afterwards Pushpodbhava prevents a woman from burning herself, who proves to be his mother, and having brought his parents together he conveys them to Ujjayiní. Here he falls in love with a merchant's daughter, whom he meets at the house of a friend, and she returns his affection. She is wooed, however, by the Prince of Ujjayiní, Dáruvarmá, and is apprehensive of his violence. By Pushpodbhava's advice, she gives out that her chamber is haunted by a Yaksha, an evil spirit, and that she will wed the person who shall free her from his presense. Dáruvarmá defies the goblin, and is visited by the damsel, when Pushpodbhava, disguised as a female attendant, beats him to death. The catastrophe is ascribed to the wrath of the spirit, and no further inquiry is made: the ceremony of exorcism is performed, and Pushpodbhava marries the damsel. This story turns upon a superstition common in the East, and familiar to us in the adventures of Tobias, although in this case it is employed very coolly as the pretext of murder. Dáruvarmá is represented, however, as odious for his profligacy and tyranny, and the infliction of deserved punishment is considered as justificatory of the crime.

* [Lassen, Ind. Alt., III, 170 ff.]

Rájaváhana resides for some time with his friends at Ujjayiní, when he beholds, at the festival of Káma-deva, Avantisundarí, the daughter of Mánasára, the conqueror of his paternal kingdom, but who had resigned his sovereignty to his son Darpasára. He again had gone to Rájagiri to perform austere penance, and had appointed his cousins Dáruvarmá and Chandravarmá in his place during his absence. The former of these, as has been just mentioned, has been killed, and Chandravarmá reigns alone. The princess and Rájaváhana are mutually smitten, and, through the contrivance of a friendly magician, are legally married in the actual presence of Chandravarmá, the viceroy being made to believe that the scene is a mere delusion. With this incident terminates the Purva Píthiká, or Introductory Section.

The first section of the body of the work represents Rájaváhana as domesticated in the interior apartments of the palace as the husband of Avantisundarí. During their repose the prince and his bride are disturbed by a dream, and, on awaking, find the feet of the Prince firmly bound by silver fetters. The princess is imprudently vociferous in the expression of her terror, and the attendants echo her clamour so loudly as to alarm the guard, who enter and discover Rájaváhana. Chandravarmá commands Rájaváhana to be put to death, but the execution is prohibited by the interposition of Mánasára, who, although abdicated, exercises some influence over his son's deputy, and has no objection to Rájaváhana as a son-in-law. Chandravarmá confines Rájaváhana in a wooden cage, and refers his sentence to Darpasára, who is engaged in austerities at Rájagiri, and in the meantime marches against Sinhavarmá, the king of Anga, and besieges his capital, Champá, a name still preserved by a village in the neighbourhood of Bhagalpur. Rájaváhana in his cage accompanies the march. Sinhavarmá, sallying from Champá, is taken prisoner, and the city falls into the hands of the victor; so does the Princess Ambáliká, of whom Chandravarmá is enamoured, and whom he determines to wed.

After the action, a messenger arrives from Darpa-sára, commanding that Rájaváhana shall be put to death without delay. Chandravarmá accordingly orders that while he goes to solemnize his nuptials Rájaváhana shall be brought forth to be thrown under the feet of a fierce elephant. While expecting the execution of the sentence, the chain falls from the feet of Rájaváhana, and becomes a nymph of air—an Apsaras—condemned to that form by the anger of a Muni whom she had offended, and picked up by Mánasára, a genius of the air, one of the Vidyádhara, to whom Avantisundarí had been promised by her brother. Finding, in one of his nocturnal peregrinations, that the lady had chosen another lord, Mánasára imposed the fetters on Rájaváhana, and caused his detection. The time of the nymph's transformation has now expired, and she takes her departure, leaving Rájaváhana at liberty, having been previously removed from his cage.

A clamour now arises that Chandravarmá has been killed. Rájaváhana, in the confusion, mounts the elephant appointed to crush him, strikes down the driver, turns the animal towards the palace, and invites aloud the brave man who has slain the tyrant to come to him for protection. The murderer accepts the summons, rushes through the crowd, springs upon the elephant, and proves to be one of the Prince's friends Apaháravarmá. They defend themselves valiantly against the followers of Chandravarmá, until intelligence is brought of the arrival of Sinhavarmá's allies, with a host before which the troops of Ujjayiní have fled. Their safety, and that of the king of Champá, is now ensured. Among the allies of the latter, Rájaváhana finds all the rest of his old companions, and by his desire they severally relate to him their adventures.

Apaháravarmá's story forms the subject of the second book, and is perhaps the best in the collection, being more rich than the others in varied incidents. Searching for the prince, he repairs to a celebrated hermit, Maríchi, to consult him where Rájaváhana is to be found. Maríchi desires him to remain at Champá, and he will hear of his friend, and entertains him with his own adventures, having been beguiled into the love of a courtesan named Kámamanjarí, who had wagered her liberty with another of her class that she would lead the holy man into folly. She succeeds, persuades him to accompany her to the city, wins her wager, laughs at her lover, and sends him back to his hermitage overwhelmed with shame and self-reproach. The story presents a curious picture of the pains taken with the education of public women. Not only were their health, their physical development, and personal beauty attended to; not only were the graces of deportment and elegance of attire and ornament sedulously studied, but their intellectual training was an equal object of vigilance; and they were taught a variety of subjects calculated to heighten their fascination and strengthen their understanding. Dancing, music, and acting formed their profession, and they were also taught to paint, to dress delicate dishes, to compound fragrant perfumes, and to dispose tastily of flowers; to play various games; to read, to write, and to speak different languages; and they were instructed superficially, it is said, in grammar, logic, metaphysics. A remarkable picture is also drawn of the devices resorted to, to bring them into public consideration, many of which may find a parallel in the contrivances by which public performers in European countries are sometimes forced into popularity. Apahāravarmā, piqued by her cleverness, determines to humble the conceit of Kāmamanjarī, and sets off to Champá.

On arriving near Champá, Apahāravarmā finds a man by the road-side apparently in great distress. He proves to be another victim of Kāmamanjarī's arts, formerly an opulent merchant, but ruined by his attachment to her, and he is now an inmate of a Buddhist convent. He is called, from his ugliness, Virúpaka. He repents his abandonment of the faith of his ancestors, and is desirous of returning to it. Apahāravarmā recommends him to remain as he is for a short time, until he shall be replaced in possession of his property, which he undertakes to recover. The incident is worthy of notice, as indicating the cotemporary existence of the Buddhists at the date of the work, and an additional confirmation, therefore, of its not being later than the tenth or eleventh century; as after that period notices of Buddhists by Hindu writers are rare and inaccurate.

Having proceeded into the city, Apaháravarmá enters into a gambling-house, such places being licensed under Hindu rule. Here he wins a considerable sum of money, and establishes his credit both for skill in play and for liberality, distributing half his winnings among the assistants. He then sallies forth well armed to perpetrate house-breaking, another of the accomplishments of princely education, but falls in with a young and beautiful woman, Kulapáliká, the daughter of Kuveradatta, who has run away from home to avoid a marriage with Arthapati, a rich merchant, to whom her father has promised her, having previously betrothed her to Dhanamitra, also a merchant, but who has become impoverished by his munificence. He is still the object of Kulapáliká's affection, and she is on her way to her lover when encountered by Apaháravarmá. He sympathizes with her distress, and conducts her to Dhanamitra, with whom he becomes united in most intimate friendship, and to whose union with Kulapáliká he engages to obtain her father's consent. In furtherance of this scheme they take Kulapáliká home, and with her aid plunder her father's house of every thing of value. They leave the damsel at home, and return to the house of Dhanamitra, plundering the residence of Arthapati on their way, and concealing their booty in a thicket.

The loss of property has the effect of suspending Kulapáliká's marriage, and in the meantime Dhanamitra, by desire of his friend, takes an old leather purse to the Rájá of Anga, and tells him that, having repaired to a forest to put an end to his life, in consequence of her father's refusing to grant Kulapáliká to him, he was met by a holy man, who withheld him from self destruction, and presented him with a purse, which, he said, in the hands of a merchant or a courtesan who should not have wrongfully appropriated the property of others, would prove a source of inexhaustible wealth—the purse, in fact, of Fortunatus. This he offers to the King, who not only declines to accept it, but promises to protect him in its safe possession. The story spreads, and its truth is confirmed by the return of Dhanamitra to his former profuse liberality, the funds of which are derived from the stolen property. Among others, Kuveradatta, hearing of Dhanamitra's recovered affluence, grows cold to Arthapati, and gives his daughter to her former affianced husband.

Shortly afterwards, Rágamanjarí, the younger sister of Kámamanjarí, makes her appearance as a public performer, with great success and with unsullied reputation. She and Apaháravarmá become mutually enamoured, but their union is prevented by her mother and sister, who look upon Apaháravarmá as a pauper. The objection is overcome by his undertaking to steal the "inexhaustible purse", and give it to Ká-mamanjarí, provided she fulfil the condition of restoring their property to those whom she had reduced to poverty. Accordingly the Buddhist Virúpaka recovers his wealth.

Dhanamitra, acting in concert with Apaháravarmá, complains to the Rájá of the loss of his purse, and after a time Kámananjarí is called before the Rájá and accused of the theft. At the suggestion of Apaháravarmá the crime is imputed to Arthapati, who is consequently banished, and whose property is confiscated.

Apaháravarmá, in a fit of extravagant bravado, attacks the patrol, and is taken prisoner. The charge of the gaol has lately devolved on Kántaka, a vain young man, who threatens the prisoner with eighteen kinds of torture and final death, unless he restores all the wealth he has stolen, and particularly the inexhaustible purse, which he is said to have carried off. The Rájá, at Dhanamitra's request, promises him liberty if he will restore it. In the meantime Rágamanjarí and the Rájá's daughter Ambáliká have become intimate friends, and the latter is prepared to share the affections of Apaháravarmá. The latter has a rival in Kántaka, who flatters himself that the Princess loves him. He is encouraged in this belief by Śrígáliká, the nurse of Rágamanjarí, and emissary of Apaháravarmá, who also persuades him that the lines in his hand announce his elevation to the kingdom, and that if he could make his way into the interior of the palace, which adjoins the gaol, Ambáliká would wed him. Kán-taka applies to Apaháravarmá, as a skilful house-breaker, to help him, promising to set him free, but secretly purposing, as he informs Śrīgáliká, to confine him again and put him to death. Apaháravarmá consents, and makes an excavation under the prison walls, by which he and Kántaka might pass into the palace; but he takes an opportunity of killing Kántaka, in anticipation of the deadly project entertained by the latter, and proceeds alone into the apartments of the Princess. He finds her asleep, delineates his portrait on the wall, with a verse imparting a hope that she may not suffer the pangs of love by which he is afflicted, and returns to the prison. He then liberates the former governor, who was also in detention there, and, with his consent, makes his escape.

Ambáliká, on waking, beholds the drawing, and reads the verse, and is enamoured of the author. Her union with him is accomplished, when Chañḍavarmá besieges Champá, and, after the capture of the Rájá, seizes the person of the Princess, and compels her submission to a public celebration of their nuptials. Apaháravarmá, having directed his friend Dhanamitra privately to assemble a party of citizens round the palace, passes into it in the garb of one of the attendants, and, as Chañḍavarmá attempts to take the shrinking hand of Ambáliká, approaches and stabs him. In the confusion he snatches up Ambáliká, and carries her to his friends, under whose protection he gains the innermost chambers, and prepares to defend himself, when he hears of the arrival of Rájaváhana, whom he joins in the manner above described. This closes the second section, constituting a large proportion of the whole.

In the third chapter the other son of the king of Mithilá, Upaháravarmá, narrates his adventures. He had repaired to his own country, Mithilá, in search of the Prince, and thus met with a female ascetic, who proved to have been his nurse who lost him in the woods in the manner related in the Introduction. His father, Praháravarmá, on returning, found his kingdom occupied by the sons of his elder brother, with Vikatavarmá at their head, and has been defeated by them and thrown into prison, together with his queen. Upaháravarmá determines to effect their rescue, and, through the agency of his nurse's daughter, contrives to win the affections of Vikatavarmá's queen, offended by the dissolute manners of her husband. At the suggestion of Upaháravarmá she persuades the Rájá, who is remarkable for his ugliness and deformity, that a mystical rite has been communicated to her, by which he may be transformed into perfect symmetry and beauty. He falls into the snare, and is murdered by Upaháravaríná, who then openly assumes his throne as the metamorphosed Rájá. The intended change had been made the subject of previous report, and its possibility, through the power of magic, was not doubted—a probable illustration of the credulous superstition of the author's times. The belief of the ministers is confirmed, also, by Upaháravarmá's acquaintance with certain secret projects of his predecessors, which he had revealed to the Ráñí as a preliminary condition of his transformation. They are all of an iniquitous tenor, and are reversed by Upaháravarmá, with the applause of his counsellors. Among these was the intention of defrauding a Yavana merchant of the fair price of a very valuable diamond which he has for sale—a notice which is interesting as a proof of the intercourse of foreign traders, Arabs or Persians, with India before the Mohammedan conquest. Another was, the purpose of taking off the Rájá Praháravarmá by poison—a crime which justifies Upaháravarmá's proceedings. He sets his parents at liberty, and places his father on the throne, receiving from him the office of Yuvarája, in which capacity he commands the army sent by the Rájá of Mithilá to the aid of the Rájá of Anga, and, consequently, meets with Rájaváhana.

The fourth chapter contains the story of Arthapála's adventures, comprising those also of his father, Kámapála, the son of one of Rájahansa's ministers, who had early disappeared from court, and who is now King of Kási, or Benares, which city Arthapála visits. We find the celebrated ghát Mañikarníká named; but instead of Viśveśwara, the form of Śiva now worshipped there, we have an older appellation, one found in several of the Puráñas, or Avimukteswara*. Arthapála encounters a man in deep affliction, and, inquiring the cause, learns that he is in despair on account of the danger of Kámapála, late minister of the King of Káśí, who had been his benefactor. Having been struck by the strength and resolution of this man, named Púrñabhadra, in baffling and putting to flight an elephant by whom he was to be put to death for thieving, Kámapála pardoned him, took him into his confidence, and told him his adventures. Having quitted Pushpapura he came to Benares, where he beheld the Princess Kántimatí, the daughter of Chañdasinha. A love match takes place between them, the result of which is the birth of Arthapála, who is secretly removed and exposed in a cemetery, where he is found by Táraválí, a Yakshiñí, who carries him to the Queen of Rájahansa, as mentioned in the Introduction. The intrigue is discovered by the Rájá, and Kámapála is seized, and is to be put to death. He makes his escape, and hides in the forests, where Táraválí, who had been his wife in two preceding births, when he bore the names of Śaunaka and Śúdraka, comes to his succour, and again becomes his bride. With her aid he gains unperceived admission into the sleeping apartments of Chañdasinha, wakes him from his sleep, and intimidates him into acknowledging him as his son-in-law, and as Yuvarája. On his death his son Chañdaghosha becomes Rájá, with Kámapála's assent, and on his dying early the latter inaugurates Sinhaghosha, the son of Chañdaghosha, as king. A faction is formed against the minister, and the prince is persuaded that he has caused the death of his predecessors, and will attempt his life if not anticipated. Kámapála is therefore seized, and ordered for execution. Púrñabhadra, in despair, is about to put an end to himself.

While Arthapála considers how he may rescue his father, a poisonous snake shews itself, which he, safe in his knowledge of mantras or charms, secures. With this he departs to where his father is led to his fate, and in the crowd throws the snake upon him, which bites him, and he falls apparently lifeless, the fatal operation of the venom being counteracted by Arthapála's magical powers. He is supposed to be dead, and is carried to his dwelling. His wife Kántimatí, privily apprised, through Púrñabhadra, of her son's device, obtains permission to burn herself with the body, and a pile is constructed in the court-yard of Kámapála's house within an enclosure, into which Kántimatí enters alone—peculiarities in the performance of the Satí unknown to the practice of later years. Kámapála, resuscitated and reunited to his wife and son, collects his friends, and puts his dwelling into an attitude of defence. The Rájá, hearing of his recovery, besieges him. Arthapála constructs a tunnel leading to the royal palace, with the intention of carrying off Chañdaghosha: when half way through he comes upon a spacious subterranean chamber, where Mañikarñiká, the daughter of Chañdaghosha, had been secreted by her grandfather, who destined her to be the bride of Darpasára, the son of Mánasára, king of Málava, and had shut her up that she might not make a different election for herself. Chañdasinha had died, however, without accomplishing his object, and Mañikarníká, with her nurse and attendants, had continued in their hiding-place, well supplied with all necessaries, but in other respects unnoticed, until she had attained a marriageable age. Arthapála, although he admires the princess, pursues his purpose, and, by the communication with the subterranean chambers, enters into the Rájá's sleeping apartment, and carries him a prisoner back to the dwelling of Kámapála, who then administers the kingdom. The Princess is married to Arthapála, who becomes Yuvarája, and leads an army to the assistance of the King of Anga.

The fifth section relates the adventures of Pramati, who is here represented as the son of Kámapála by the Yakshiñí Táraválí, and not, as in the Introduction, the son of Sumati. Arthapála is there also called the son of Táraválí, while, as we have seen in the preceding narrative, he is described as the son of Kántimatí. Either the author has been nodding, or the Introduction is the work of a different writer, who has been heedless or forgetful of the narrative of his predecessor. While on his journey Pramati is benighted in a forest on the Vindhya mountains, and, recommending himself to the protection of the local divinities, goes to sleep beneath a tree. While asleep he fancies himself transported to the interior of a palace, where a princess is sleeping among her attendant damsels; that he reclines beside her; that she awakes, and they exchange looks, but fall asleep again: when he wakes he finds himself still in the forest. There presently appears to him a nymph, who declares herself to be Tárávalí, the bride of Kámapála, who had left his house in anger, and had consequently become an evil spirit for a twelvemonth. The term of her penance had expired on the preceding evening, and she was on her way to the neighbouring city of Śrávastí, when she was arrested by Pramati's invocation, and conveyed him to the chamber of Navamálíká, daughter of Dharmavarddhana, Rájá of Śrávastí. In the morning, before dawn, she brings him back to the forest, and then recognises him as her own son by Kámapála. She leaves him to seek his fortune, and he repairs to Śrávastí to endeavour to obtain the hand of the princess. On the way he stops at a cock-fight, and there contracts a friendship with an old Brahman. He then proceeds to Śrávastí, where, in a garden in the suburbs, he is noticed by one of the attendants of the princess, who has a portrait in her hand, which proves to be his own. It is the work of Navamálíká, who has delineated it in the hope of discovering the original, whom she has seen, as she supposes, in a dream. A plan is devised to effect their union. The old Brahman takes Pramati, in the dress of a female, to the Rájá, and introduces him as his daughter, who has been betrothed some time, but whose bridegroom is absent. The pretended father therefore professes to go in search of him, and asks to leave his daughter in the care of the Rájá, to which the latter consents. Pramati thus obtains access to his mistress. After a short time he contrives to make his escape and assume his own semblance, and returns with the Brahman as his son-in-law to claim his bride. The bride, however, is not forthcoming, and the Rájá, to divert the dreaded imprecation of the Brahman, consents to give his own daughter as a substitute for the missing damsel. Pramati thus becomes the son-in-law of the Rájá, and leads his troops to Anga, where he finds his prince.

Mitrugupta next narrates his proceedings, in the sixth section, at Dámaliptá, in the Suhma country, the king of which is Tungadhanwá. By propitiating Vin-dhyavásini he obtains two children, a son and a daughter, on condition that the former shall be subordinate to the husband of the latter, and that the daughter shall annually exhibit her skill in playing at ball, in honour of the goddess, until she meets with her destined husband, of whom she is to be allowed the free choice. She is called Kandukávati, her brother, Bhí-madhanwá. Mitrugupta beholds the pastime of the princess, which is described with singular minuteness of detail, and they become mutually enamoured, carrying on a communication through Chandrasená, the foster-sister of the princess, who is the object of the young prince's affection, but who is attached to a different person, one Koshadása. Mitrugupta forms an intimate friendship with him, and devises schemes for their joint success, when he is seized by order of Bhí-madhanwá, and thrown, fettered, into the sea. With the aid of a strong plank he floats until he is picked up by a Yavana vessel, apparently intimating an Arab ship. He has not changed his lot to advantage, and is about to be maltreated, when the vessel is attacked by another ship from the shore. Mitragupta encourages the crew to resist, and, being let loose, animates them to board and capture their assailant, the captain of which proves to be Bhímadhanwá. He is taken on board the Yavana vessel and confined, when a contrary wind rises, and carries the ship out of her course to a distant island, abounding with fruit and fresh water. They anchor, and Mitragupta goes on shore. He meets with a Rákshas, who threatens to kill him unless he answers correctly to the questions, What is that which is naturally cruel? What is the great wish of a householder? What is love? What overcomes difficulties? To which he replies severally, The heart of a woman; A virtuous wife; Determination to possess; Intelligence; and illustrates his replies by four narratives, of each of which a woman is the heroine. These narratives present some curious pictures of manners, and several incidents which are to be found in other compilations, particularly the third story, in which the wife of a merchant is made to appear, in the estimation of her husband and the Pancháyat, or Council of the city, a Dákińś, or woman who obtains supernatural powers by an impure intercourse with the spirits of ill, who haunt the ground where the dead are buried. The point of the story is found in the first narrative of the Baitál Páchśśí.

The Rákshas is pleased by the stories he hears, and promises Mitragupta his friendship. He is presently called upon to prove it. A brother Rákshas is seen in the sky, carrying off a female, evidently against her will. Mitragupta's friend ascends to the rescue, and the ravisher drops the damsel, who proves to be Kandukávati. Mitragupta sets sail with her, and arrives at Dámaliptá in time to save the lives of the King and Queen and all the chief citizens, who had vowed to starve themselves to death on the banks of the Ganges. He restores the Princess and her brother to their parents, and is gladly accepted by them as their son-in-law. Tungadhanwá is one of the allies of Anga, and Mitragupta has come to Champá in command of his troops.

The adventures of Mantragupta form the subject of the seventh chapter. He arrives at Kalinga, and goes to sleep on the edge of a lake bordered by a thicket contiguous to the burning-ground of the dead. He is wakened by a conversation between two goblins relating to a Siddha, an ascetic, who has acquired magical powers; and, curious to know what it means, follows them privily to where their master is seated, decorated with ornaments of human bones, smeared with ashes, wearing braided hair, and feeding a fire by dropping into it, with his left hand, seeds of mustard and sesamum. At his command the Princess of Kalinga, Karnálekhá, is brought by one of his ministering demons before him. The ascetic seizes her by the hair, and is about to cut off her head, when Mantragupta rushes upon him, and decapitates him with his own sword. He hides the head and hair in the hollow of a tree. The spirits present, wearied of the tyranny and cruelty of the magician, praise the youth for his courage, and declare themselves his servants. He desires them to convey the Princess to her apartments, but she implores him to accompany her, and they are both carried into the palace, where Mantragupta remains undiscovered.

The King of Kalinga, Kardana, moves in the hot season with his family and suite to the sea-shore, to spend a few days encamped upon the sand. While amusing himself with songs and music and merry-making he is suddenly attacked by the flotilla of the King of Andhra, and, with his wife and daughter, carried prisoner to Andhra, leaving Mantragupta overwhelmed with despair. He hears, after a short time, that Jayasinha, the King of Andhra, woos Kárnalekhá to become his queen. A report, however, prevails that a Yaksha loves the Princess, and that unless he can be put to flight by a powerful sorcerer, the Rájá's suit cannot be safely prosecuted. Mantragupta avails himself of the hint, and sets off for Andhra in the character of a magician, dressed in the tangled hair of the Siddha whom he had decapitated, and accompanied by disciples who spread his reputation through the country. The King soon hears of his fame, and applies to him for aid. After some pretended hesitation, he desires the Rájá to plunge at midnight into a neighbouring pond, having previously had it dragged to remove all its living creatures, and surrounded it at some little distance by guards to prevent any one's approach. By doing this, and in consequence of the magic rites which he, the pretended sorcerer, has practised, he will issue forth with a person entirely metamorphosed, and such as the Yaksha will be unable to resist. With these instructions the pretended ascetic takes his leave of the Rájá, professing that he has tarried longer than was consistent with his religious observances in the same place, He accordingly sends off his followers, but secretes himself in a hollow which he has previously dug in the bank of the pond. The King conforms to the directions he has received, but, when he is under water, is seized by Mantragupta, and stifled. His body is concealed in the hollow, and his enemy comes forth from the water as representing the Rájá. The guards, deeming it impossible that any other person could have issued from the pond, acquiesce quietly in the substitution, and escort Mantragupta to the palace, where he privately communicates the truth to the princess and her parents, and, with their concurrence, marries Karnálekhá according to the ritual. Her father, Kardana, becomes King of both Andhra and Kalinga, and sends his son-in-law to succour his ally the Rájá of Anga.

One incident of this story, the transformation of the person, is repeated from the story of Upaháravarmá; but the narrative is peculiar in the locality of the incidents, the sea-coast of Kalinga, and in making Andhra, the ancient Telingana, a maritime power. There is also an allusion to the predominance of heretical opinions, either Buddhist or Jain, in Andhra; as Mantragupta, when Rájá, orders the temples of Siva, Yama, Vishnú, and other gods, to be revered, to the discomfiture and shame of the infidels or Nástikas.

The last of the narratives is attributed to Viśruta, who, while wandering in the Vindhya forest, meets with the young Prince of Vidarbha, or Berar, and extricates his solitary attendant from a well into which he had fallen while seeking to procure water for the boy, who is exhausted with hunger and thirst. The Prince is of the family of Bhoja: his grand-father, Puñyavarmá, is described as a Prince of superior merit; but his father, Anantavarmá, is led by vicious companions into habits of dissipation, which end in the loss of his kingdom and life. The arguments which are urged by one of his favourites in behalf of idle pleasures, and in detraction of grave advisers and ministers, while they speak the language of the profligate in all ages, afford some curious insight into the abuses of official authority which prevailed in Indian Governments at the time of the composition. There is also, in the account of the feudatories of Anantavarmá, whose disaffection is the cause of his death, an interesting enumeration of the principalities bordering on Berar, to the north and west. Some of them must be identical in topographical situation with the provinces of the Mahratta principality, but the name Mahratta does not occur. It is found in older writings as Mahá-ráshtra; but the kingdom appears to have been broken up in the middle ages into a number of petty states, among whom the ancient name was forgotten, or it was applied to the people, not to the territory; a circumstance which is equally applicable to modern times, in which we have "the Marhattas", the people of Khándesh, Poona, and the Konkan, not of Maháráshtra.

After the death of Anantavarmá, his Queen, Vasundhará, with her daughter, Manjuvadiní, and her son, Bháskaravarmá, take refuge with the half-brother of her husband, Mitravarmá, Prince of Mhishmatí. Her plots against his nephew's life, and the Rání sends her son into the thickets with one of her attendants. They are suffering greatly from hunger and thirst, when Viśruta encounters them, and relieves their necessities. He proves to be a kinsman of the Prince's mother, and engages to replace him in his father's kingdom. Her therefore sends her servant back to Vasundhará, to inform her of what has chanced, and desires her to spread a report that the Prince has been devoured by a tiger. He sends her also a poisoned chaplet, with which he directs her to strike Mitravarmá on the heart, exclaiming that it will prove fatal only if she has been a faithful wife; and then, washing the garland, she is to apply it to her daughter's person, when it will prove innocuous. The death of Mitravarmá is accordingly considered by the people to be the consequence of his guilt, not of any treacherous practice. The principality is taken possession of by Prachāṇḍavarmá, who demands Manjuvadiní in marriage; a demand with which the Queen, by Viśruta's advice, feigns to comply. Vi-śruta and his charge, in the disguise of Śaiva ascetics, then repair to Vidarbha, where the former attires himself as a juggler, and mixing with a crowd of dancers and posture-masters, by whom Prachāṇḍavarmā is surrounded, exhibits various feats of sleight of hand and activity: among other things, he plays with knives, and tossing one of them in the direction of Prachāṇḍavarmā, it penetrates his breast and kills him. In the confusion Viśruta escapes, resumes his garb, and hides himself with the young Prince in an old temple of Durgā, where he contrives the means of entering it unobserved, and concealing himself underneath the pedestal of the image. The Rāñī, in obedience to a pretended vision, repairs to the temple, attended by all the chief people of Māhishmatī, in whose presence she has the interior examined and the doors closed. After an interval the doors are opened from within, and Viśruta and the Prince appear. The former tells the people that he is the minister of the goddess, and is commanded by her to announce to them that she was pleased, in the form of a tigress, to carry off the Prince, in order more effectually to save him from his enemies; but as they are now removed, she restores him to their homage. He is accordingly recognised as Rājā; and Viśruta marrying Manjuvādinī, he becomes the chief manager of the principality. The last incident may be regarded as evidence of the profane uses to which the divinities of the Hindus were sometimes made subservient. The new Minister proceeds to take measures for recovering Vidarbha, which has been seized by the King of the Aśmakas, and we may conclude that he is victorious; but the work terminates abruptly, and leaves the denouement to the imagination. The deficiency is supplied by Gopínátha, who not only carries on the story of Viśruta to the end, but takes the united Princes to Pátaliputra, and re-establishes Rájahansa in his kingdom. We might have annexed his supplement, but the narrative is not of great interest, and the only copy of the work available is far from accurate. It has been thought better, therefore, to close with Daṇḍi's own composition.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL SCIENCES OF THE HINDUS.

From the Oriental Magazine, Vol. I (1823), p. 349—56.

HAVING established the fact of Surgical Science being known, as a distinct branch of Medicine, to the early writers of the Hindus, we come to the consideration of the extent and manner, in which it was practised. According to our own system, and to all correct principle, we should for this purpose ascertain, in the first instance, what degree of acquaintance they possessed with Anatomy, on which alone rational Surgery is founded. Such however is not their mode of conducting the enquiry, and as we are endeavouring to trace their systems, and not those of a more enlightened period, we may be satisfied to wave this topic for the present, and adopt the course their own authorities pursue.

The practical part of the subject of Surgery is preceded by a few general remarks, in which, amidst many erroneous notions, we trace some justness of classification, and soundness of principle. "Living bodies are composed," it is said *, "of the five elements, with action or life superadded: they are produced from vapour, vegetation, incubation, and parturition, as insects, plants, birds, fishes, reptiles, and animals. All the Hindu systems consider vegetable bodies as endowed with life. Of animals, man is the chief, and in proportion to his complicated structure is his liability to disease. The disorders of the human frame are of four kinds, accidental, organic, intellectual, and natural. The injuries arising from external causes form the first class. The second comprehends the effects of the vitiated humours, or derangements of the blood, bile, wind, and phlegm. The third class is occasioned by the operation of the passions, or the effects on the constitution of rage, fear, sorrow, joy, and others; and the last is referable to the necessary and innate condition of our being, as thirst, hunger, sleep, old age, and decay.

* [We regret that the second portion of this Essay came too late to hand for insertion in the proper place.]

"The judicious alleviation of human infirmities, the means of which were compassionately revealed by the gods, can only be effected by the knowledge that is to be gained from study and practice conjoined. He who is only versed in books will be alarmed and confused, like a coward in the field of battle, when he is called upon to encounter active disease. He who rashly engages in practice, without previous conversancy with written science, will be entitled to no respect from mankind, and merits punishment from the king. Those men who, in ignorance of the structure of the human frame, venture to make it the subject of their experiments, are the murderers of their species. He alone, who is endowed with both theory and experience, proceeds with safety and stability, like a chariot on two wheels."—It is much to be regretted that these aphorisms have so little influenced Hindu practitioners.

The instrumental part of Medical treatment was, according to the best authorities, of eight kinds—Chhedana, cutting or scission; Bhedana, division or excision; Lekhana, which means drawing lines, appears to be applied to scarification and inoculation; Vyadhana, puncturing; Eshya, probing, or sounding; Āhārya, extraction of solid bodies, Visrávaṇa, extraction of fluids, including venesection; and Sevana, or sewing: and the mechanical means, by which these operations were performed, seem to have been sufficiently numerous. Of these the principal are the following:—

Yantras, properly machines, in the present case instruments; but to distinguish them from the next class, to which that title more particularly applies, we may call them implements; Śastras, weapons, or instruments; Kshāra, alkaline solutions, or caustics; Agni, fire, the actual cautery; Śalākā, pins, or tents; Śringa, horns, the horns of animals open at the extremities, and, as well as Alábú or gourds, used as our cupping glasses; the removal of the atmospheric pressure through the first being effected by suction, and in the second by rarifying the air by the application of a lamp. The next subsidiary means are Jalauká, or leeches.

Besides these, we have thread, leaves, bandages, pledgets, heated metallic plates for erubescents, and a variety of astringent or emollient applications. The enumeration is tolerably full, and the details are curious, if not instructive.

The detailed descriptions of the Hindu instruments we have been able to meet with are not very minute or precise. As also they are not illustrated by drawings or plates,* we are deprived of any thing like ocular verification of their construction. A few instruments, and some of neat and ingenious fabric, are in the hands of native operators, particularly those for depressing cataracts; but they are not very common, and we know not how far they may correspond with those designated by early writers. We can only therefore conjecture what the instruments might have been, by adding to the imperfect description given of them the purport of their names, and the objects to which they were applied.

The Yantras, or implements, known to the author of the Sauśruta were one hundred and one, and are classed as Swastikas, Sandanásas, Tálayantras, Nádfyantras, Śalákás, and Upayantras.*

* [A plate containing drawings of the 20 Śastras is inserted in Wise's Hindu System of Medicine. Calcutta: 1845, facing p. 169.]

The Swastikas are twenty four in number—they are metallic, usually eighteen inches long, having heads or points fancifully shaped like the heads of animals, the beaks of birds, &c. They are secured with small pins, and are curved or hooked at the points, and are used to extract splinters of bone or foreign bodies lodged in the bones—they were therefore pincers, nippers, or forcipes.

The Sandanásas, which in usual import mean tongs, were of that description. There were in the time of Susruta but two sorts, one with and one without a ligature or noose (Nigraha?) attached. They were smaller than the preceding, being but sixteen inches in length; and were used to remove extraneous substances from the soft parts, as the flesh, skin, vessels, &c. The work of Vágbhatta adds another sort, only six inches long, which were employed preferably for the soft parts and for fleshy excrescences.

The Tálayantras must have been something of the same kind, only smaller, their length being but twelve inches. They were but two, and were employed to bring away foreign matters lodged in the outer canals, as the ears, &c.

The Nádfyantras were, as the name implies, tubular instruments. There were twenty sorts, varying in size and shape according to their intended use. They were employed for removing extraneous bodies from deep seated canals, as the intestines, urethra, &c. for examining affections of parts similarly removed from inspection; for the introduction of other instruments, so as to enable them to be applied; and for drawing off fluids by suction, &c. The work of Vágbhatta specifies the number of perforations in each of these tubes, as they varied in this respect as well as others: the descriptions are however very indistinct, and we can only conclude generally, that they bore an analogy to our canulæ catheters, syringes, &c.

* [Susruta I, ch. 7.]

The Salákis were rods, and sounds, &c. They were of twenty-eight kinds, varying in size and shape, for extracting foreign matters, lodged in parts of difficult access; for cleansing or clearing internal canals, especially the urethra; for applying collyria, caustic solutions, and the actual cautery; and for eradicating nasal polypi, the complaint called Nakra so common and so troublesome in India, and to be alleviated by no other means than the forcible extraction of the irritating excrescence.

The Upayantras were, as their appellation signifies, merely accessory implements, such as twine, leather, bark skin cloth, &c.

The first, best, and most important of all implements, however, is declared to be the Hand.

The next division of our apparatus consists of the Śāstras, the instruments, of which twenty different sorts are enumerated by Suśruta,* twenty-six by Vāgbhaṭṭa. They were of metal, and should be always bright, handsome, polished, and sharp; sufficiently so indeed to divide a hair longitudinally. The latter authority adds, they were in general not above six inches in length, and that the blade forms about a half or quarter of that length. They are less fully described than the preceding in the Saṁśruta, and we can only partially, and perhaps not very accurately, notice a few of them, as detailed in the two works referred to.

The Maṇḍalāgra appears to be a round pointed lancet; the Vṛiddhipatra a knife with a broad blade; the Arddhadhārās are perhaps knives with one edge; the Trikūrchaka is a lancet with three prongs or blades; the Vṛittāgra may be a sort of canular trochar, having a guarded point. The Vrihimukha is a perforating instrument, and when used is held in the hollow of the hand, whilst the point is steadied between the thumb and forefinger. The Kuthārikā appears to be a kind of Bistouri, as it is a cutting instrument to be held in the left hand, whilst it is conducted by the thumb and middle finger of the right. The Vaḍiśa is a hooked or curved instrument, for extracting foreign substances, and the Dantaśanku appears to be an instrument for drawing teeth. The Ārā and Karapatra are saws for cutting through bones. The Eśaṇī is a blunt straight instrument, six or eight inches long, for examining abscesses, sinuses, &c. or, in fact, a probe. The Súchí is a needle.

* [I, ch. 8.]

Anúśastras are supplements, or substitutes; such as rough leaves, that draw blood, as those of the Sépháliká, Gojí, &c. crystal, or glass; the pith of some trees, skin, leeches, caustics, &c. With these therefore, and the Yantras, the Hindu Chirurgeon was not ineffectively armed.

The means by which the young practitioner is to obtain dexterity in the use of his instruments are of a mixed character; and whilst some are striking specimens of the lame contrivances to which the want of the only effective vehicle of instruction, human dissection, compelled the Hindus to have recourse, others surprise us by their supposed incompatibility with what we have been hitherto disposed to consider as insurmountable prejudices. Thus the different kinds of scission, longitudinal, transverse, inverted, and circular, are directed to be practised on flowers, bulbs, and gourds. Incision on skins, or bladders, filled with paste and mire;—scarification on the fresh hides of animals from which the hair has not been removed;—puncturing, or lancing, on the hollow stalks of plants, or the vessels of dead animals;—extraction on the cavities of the same, or fruits with many large seeds, as the Jack and Bel;—sutures, on skin and leather, and ligatures and bandages on well-made models of the human limbs. The employment of leather, skin, and even of dead carcasses, thus enjoined, proves an exemption from notions of impurity we were little to expect when adverting to their actual prevalence. Of course, their use implies the absence of any objections to the similar employment of human subjects; and although they are not specified, they may possibly be implied, in the general direction which the author of the Sauśruta gives, that the teacher shall seek to perfect his pupil by the application of all expedients which he may think calculated to effect his proficiency.

Of the supplementary articles of Hindu surgery the first is Kshára, alkaline or alkalescent salts.* This is obtained by burning different vegetable substances, and boiling the ashes with five or six times their measure of water. In some cases the concentrated solution is used after straining, and is administered internally, as well as applied externally. For the latter purpose, however, the Śárngadhara directs the solution, after straining, to be boiled to dryness; by which, of course, a carbonate of potash will be obtained, more or less caustic according to its purity. It is not unlikely that some of the vegetable substances employed will yield a tolerably pure alkali, and in that case will afford an active caustic. Care is enjoined in their use, and emollient applications are to be applied, if the caustic occasions very great pain. At the same time these and the other substitutes for instrumental agents are only to be had recourse to, where it is necessary to humour the weakness of the patient.

* [Suśr. I, ch. 11.]

They are especially found serviceable, where the surgeon has to deal with princes and persons of rank, old men, women and children, and individuals of a timid and effeminate character.

We need not advert particularly to the nature and use of the horns and gourds, as, however rude the substitute, the principle is sufficiently obvious and correct. With respect to the bandages, also, of which fourteen kinds are described by Vágbhaṭṭa, it would be useless to attempt so unintelligible a detail. We shall therefore close this account of the Hindu apparatus, with a selection of some of the circumstances our authorities specify, regarding the actual cautery and leeches.

The *cautery is applied by hot seeds, combustible substances inflamed, boiling fluids of a gelatinous or mucous consistence, and heated metallic bars, plates, and probes. The application is useful in many cases, as to the temples and forehead for headaches; to the eyelids for diseases of the eyes; to the part affected for indurations in the skin; to the sides for spleen and liver; and to the abdomen for mesenteric enlargements. As amongst the Greeks, however, the chief use of the cautery was in the case of hemorrhages, bleeding being stopped by searing the wounded vessels.

Much pains, and perhaps to but little good purpose, were bestowed upon the subject of *leeches. It is said that there are twelve sorts, of which six are venomous:—they are thus enumerated. The six poisonous leeches are the Kṛishṇá, or black and two headed; the Karburá, the large bellied leech with a scaly hide: the Alagardá, the hairy leech; the Indrá-yudhá, which is variegated like a rain-bow, whence its name; the Sá mudriká, which is striped yellow and black; and the Gochandaná. The bites of these produce excessive irritation; great itching, heat, and pain; spasms, sickness, and syncope; and that of the Indráyudhá even death. The six sorts that are fit for use are the Kapila, or tawny leech, with a smooth back and glossy sides; the Pīngalá, a similar animal, but with a redder tinge; the Śankumukhi, which is of a yellow colour, and has a long sharp head; the Múshiká, of a dun colour; the Puṇḍarikamukhi, which is of the hue of the Mudga (Phaseolus Moong); and the Sávariká, which resembles the leaf of the lotus in its colour. The first six are bred in foul, stagnant, and putrescent waters, whilst the latter are met with in the vicinity of clear and deep pools:—they are all amphibious. Very minute instructions are laid down for their preservation and training; but we need not pause to extract them, as they are not very important. If the leeches, when applied, are slow and sluggish, a little blood may be drawn from the part by a lancet, to excite their vivacity; when they fall off, the bleeding may be maintained by the use of the horns and gourds, or the substitutes already mentioned, for the cupping glasses of our own practice.

* [Suśr. I, ch. 12.]

The details thus concisely noticed prepare us to expect an active practice amongst those to whom they were familiar; and accordingly we find that, in the practical treatment of diseases, many of the great operations of the chiropoietic art are enjoined, such as extraction of the stone in the bladder, and even the removal of the foetus from the uterus. The operations are rude, and very imperfectly described. They were evidently bold, and must have been hazardous:—their being attempted at all is however most extraordinary, unless their obliteration from the knowledge, not to say the practice, of later times be considered as a still more remarkable circumstance. It would be an enquiry of some interest, to trace the period and causes of the disappearance of Surgery from amongst the Hindus: it is evidently of comparatively modern occurrence, as operative and instrumental practice forms so principal a part of those writings, which are undeniably most ancient; and which, being regarded as the composition of inspired writers, are held of the highest authority. It is an enquiry connected with the progress of manners, for the persons whoever they were, who wrote in the character of Munis, or deified sages, would not have compromised that character by imparting precepts utterly contrary to the ritual or the law, or at variance with the principles and prejudices of their countrymen. In what has been already quoted from Suśruta and Vāgbhaṭṭa, however, there is much that is utterly irreconcilable with present notions, and in other parts of their treatises that disregard is equally evinced. We must therefore infer, that the existing sentiments of the Hindus are of modern date, growing out of an altered state of society, and unsupported by their oldest and most authentic civil and moral, as well as medical, institutes.
